REGULATION OF COLD STORAGE.

Mr. JONES. I present a letter from the president of the Pacific Cold Storage Co., of Tacoma, Wash., with reference to Senate bill 136, proposing to restrict the storage of food products in cold storage. It makes a very important statement, and I ask that it be read and then referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator from Washington as to the propriety of introducing into the RECORD a discussion of a bill that is now being considered by the committee. I thought when the Secretary commenced reading the letter it was going to convey some additional facts, but it seems——

Mr. JONES. It proceeds just at the point where the reading was interrupted with a statement of facts.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me it would have been proper to refer it to the committee having under consideration the bill rather than to refer it to the Senate while the committee is considering the bill.

Mr. JONES. The writer states some facts which I should like to have in the RECORD, and then it can be referred.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will be all in the RECORD if it goes to the committee.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senator will permit the entire letter to be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the letter.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, which is as follows:

THE PACIFIC COLD STORAGE CO.,
Tacoma, Wash., June 8, 1911.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have recently received a copy of Senator HEYBURN'S bill, No. 136, the object of which is to restrict the storage of food products in cold storage.

I hope that you will give this letter more than the usual consideration that is received by letters from constituents generally from Members of Congress.

The passage of the bill would result more seriously than would appear to the average person. I shall not attempt to discuss the policy of passing sumptuary laws by Congress and attempting by this means to regulate the business of the country. I will say this, however, that if the Members of Congress of the United States are of the impression that legislation of this kind is meeting with popular approval, they will find that they are greatly mistaken. There is a universal feeling all over the country, and especially on the Pacific coast, that there is too great a desire on the part of Congress to interfere with the ordinary course of commerce. The few muckrakers and hysterical reformers who are seeking to tax the energies and industries of the country for the benefit of the idle and worthless classes do not represent either the spirit or the judgment of the thinking people of this country. This bill of Senator HEYBURN'S is a fair specimen of what would result if it should be left to Congress to fix the limitations of trade and commerce rather than to the practical business men and the demands of the public.

I can perhaps better summarize what would be the effect of the passage of this bill than to attempt to enter into detail: In a general way, to pass this bill in its present form, or anything akin to it, will result in closing every cold-storage plant on the Pacific coast. It will practically destroy the fishing industry; it will also destroy the growing dairy and poultry industries, and will result in increasing the cost of nearly all of the products mentioned in the bill at least 100 per cent.

I am aware that you and the committee in charge of this bill will at once discredit these statements because they come from an interested party, but I beg you to listen to interested parties, as they alone are competent to deal with the practical questions involved in a proposition of this kind. For instance, to give you a single illustration, we supply practically all of Alaska with cold-storage beef, poultry, and nearly all of the products mentioned in the bill. Alaska has an open season of a few months in the year. As you are aware, all of the northern ports are closed by the freezing of the rivers and Bering Sea after, say, the middle of October, and are not accessible to a supply from the outside until about the 1st of July. This company has cold-storage steamers on the Yukon, and others plying between Puget Sound ports and Alaska. We get together our cargo generally during the month of April, buying beef and nearly all the products mentioned in the bill throughout the States and assemble them on Puget Sound, and our steamer sails about the 1st of June, as soon as we can get into the ports of northern Alaska. These products are kept in cold storage during the summer months in order to supply the people during the winter and early spring. In this far-away country it is the only way we can get supplies there, and in most instances there is only one barge or steamer that can be sent to such points as the Iditarod or others during the season, and in this way Alaska has been fed for the last 10 years. It is the only way that these products can be sent there, as it is practically impossible to ship live products these long distances, and they can not be shipped at all on account of the ice for at least 8 months. We have supplied the Government with beef, mutton, and the other articles mentioned in the bill for the last 10 years in this way without a single complaint as to the quality and condition of meats, etc. Under the limitations of this bill we could not send cold-storage stuff to Alaska, and we could not start up the machines in the spring in order to preserve it for use until other foodstuffs could reach the population, as the bill prohibits the putting back into cold storage any article having been once therein stored.

The bill would also stop the importation into Puget Sound of practically all dairy products from the East, of eggs from Nebraska, turkeys from the different States in the Union, etc. If the bill would add an additional clause to it requiring hens to lay an equal number of eggs during each month of the year, fish to spawn and run in equal proportion during each month, cows to calf, ewes to lamb, and turkeys to lay and raise their young in equal amounts during each month of the year, it would, to some extent, assist in carrying out its objects. As long as grass only grows in the spring and summer to feed cattle, and bugs and grasshoppers exert their activity for turkeys and chickens to eat at certain seasons, there will be more meat products and consumption at certain times than at others. This unbusinesslike procedure on the part of Providence has given rise to the preservation of these things for consumption, thereby lessening the cost and supplying healthy food for mankind.

It seems incredible that Congress should be moved to the passage of such extreme laws because, in a few instances, Landis or somebody else has found a few old carcasses in some cold-storage plant. If Congress must pass a law—and nothing but vengeance will satisfy—let them pass a law making it a capital offense for anybody to sell unwholesome cold-storage products and leave trade and people alone to work out their own affairs.

So far as this company and its investment of a million dollars or more in its business is concerned, it is desirous of continuing to do business in America. If this bill becomes a law the day that it is signed by the President we will be obliged to move its headquarters, its capital, and its business to Canada, or to some other country where it will be allowed to continue a business that is one of the evidences and fruits of modern civilization and progress.

Respectfully, yours, CHARLES RICHARDSON.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the license of $1,000,000 that they seem to think is sufficient to enable them to attack the health of the people by selling the few old, rotten carcasses the writer refers to is rather small. I think the license should be enlarged.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOURNE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2532) providing for an increase of salary for the collector of customs for the district of Montana and Idaho, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 66) thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2052) relating to the expenditure of an appropriation for the raising of the North Point Light Station, Wis., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 67) thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2053) providing for the disposition of moneys recovered on account of injury or damage to lighthouse property, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 68) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1447) for the relief of Thomas D. Meares, administrator of Armand D. Young, deceased, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be postponed indefinitely, which was agreed to.

RELIEF OF SHIPWRECKED PERSONS.

Mr. BURNHAM. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2054) providing for the reimbursement of certain employees of the Lighthouse Service for relief furnished to shipwrecked persons, and I submit a report (No. 65) thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is a brief bill recommended by the department, and its purpose is a beneficent one. I venture to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to reimburse, through the proper officer of the Lighthouse Service, keepers of light stations and masters of light vessels and of lighthouse tenders for rations and provisions and clothing furnished shipwrecked persons who may be temporarily provided for by them; and the appropriation "General expenses, Lighthouse Service," for the year in which the subsistence and clothing are so furnished is hereby made available for the purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANT DOORKEEPERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 65), which was read and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rule II of the Rules for the Regulation of the Senate wing of the United States Capitol, adopted by the Committee on Rules, be amended to read as follows:

"The First Assistant Doorkeeper and the Second Assistant Doorkeeper shall be assigned, during the daily sessions of the Senate, to duty on the Senate floor. They shall see that the messengers assigned to the doors upon the Senate floor are at their posts and that the floor and cloak rooms are cleared at least five minutes before the opening of daily sessions of all persons not entitled to remain there. In the absence of the Sergeant at Arms the duties of his office, so far as they pertain to the enforcement of this rule, shall devolve upon the First Assistant Doorkeeper."

ASSISTANT SERGEANT AT ARMS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 66), which was read and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Sergeant at Arms shall hereafter be designated as "Assistant Sergeant at Arms," and shall perform the duties of the Sergeant at Arms in his absence, except as provided in Rule II.

SENATE OFFICE BUILDING SUPPLIES.

Mr. LODGE. I submit the following Senate resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 67) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter no expenditures for supplies in the Senate Office Building shall be made except on the approval of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as now provided in regard to all expenditures for supplies in the Capitol.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts what is the rule now with reference to the payment of these expenses?

Mr. LODGE. Supplies for the Office Building are not under the control of our Committee to Audit and Control. Supplies for the Capitol are under the control of the committee; the others are under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Capitol. It seemed to me important that our Committee to Audit and Control should have supervision of all the expenditures for supplies furnished.

Mr. CULBERSON. It applies entirely to the Senate Office Building?

Mr. LODGE. It applies only to the Senate Office Building. It brings it under the same rule as supplies for the Capitol.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is whether his resolution, as he understands it, would cover cases where contracts have already been made.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, it would not interfere with contracts already made.

Mr. BACON. I only asked the question for the reason that, in the absence of an understanding of that kind, an unpleasant complication might arise if the superintendent, though there was no authority heretofore existing, had made contracts. I understand this is only to apply to future contracts?

Mr. LODGE. That is all. All expenditures made for the Senate ought to be under the control of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the resolution be again read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, according to the literal wording of the resolution, whether or not an expenditure should be made under a contract already entered into would be still subject to that rule.

Mr. LODGE. What contract has the Senator in mind?

Mr. BACON. I know of one. For instance, there has been set apart in the Senate Office Building a room for the conference committee of the minority of the Senate, and I have been informed, although I do not know anything of the details, that the furniture for that room has been ordered.

Mr. LODGE. But, Mr. President, that furniture is not included. It comes under a separate appropriation.

Mr. BACON. I did not know that.

Mr. LODGE. And it is under the control of the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. BACON. That is the reason I used the word "contract."

Mr. LODGE. This refers simply to current supplies, of which, I may say, mineral water is the most conspicuous.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will note the fact that the use of the word "contract" on my part indicated that I did not understand the purpose for which the resolution was designed.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 68), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Philippines be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,440 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise directed by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senate on the 8th of June adopted a resolution (S. Res. 62) calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate in regard to the purchase and proposed use of certain lands at the junction of Fifteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, extending back to the Mall. The purpose I had in introducing that resolution grew out of a statement, which was published in the newspapers, to the effect that it was proposed to extend those buildings over into the Mall. I had in mind the provisions of the bill authorizing the purchase of this ground and the plans for the construction of that building. Congress was very definite in its statement as to what ground should be purchased and upon what ground the buildings should be placed. There is nothing ambiguous or uncertain about it. In the report which the Secretary of the Treasury makes in response to the Senate resolution I find this statement:

You are also advised that the proposed plans did contemplate the erection of one of the buildings south of B Street. This was suggested by the National Fine Arts Commission, and a recommendation submitted by this department for the necessary legislation to enable the department to so place the building.

I am not aware of the views that may be entertained by other Senators, but, speaking for myself only, I regard it as a piece of vandalism to place any more public buildings in the Mall; and these, in particular, are objectionable, because they encroach upon the Monument Grounds and would, in my judgment, destroy the beauty of that park. In addition to that, Congress considered this question, through its committees, very thoroughly as to the limit to which these buildings should be extended, and there was a very decided opinion that the Mall should not be further encroached upon.

There were two buildings recently constructed within that ground which were not authorized by law. We found them there when we came back after a recess. When the Government owns on Pennsylvania Avenue now enough ground upon which to place all of the buildings that will be required for the next few years, there is no possible excuse for encroaching upon the Mall with these buildings.

I have called the attention of the Senate to this matter this morning because the report has just come in, and the statement is clear, that they have in contemplation the erection of one of these large buildings on the south side of B Street. Of course, I presume now that they will hesitate before carrying out that plan. If I shall find that there is no indication to abandon the plan, then I shall probably ask Congress to take some very quick and very decisive action in that matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Idaho, who has been greatly interested in this matter, if the bill which was passed here—the provision was contained in an appropriation bill, I believe—did not specifically provide that these buildings should be placed on Pennsylvania Avenue?

Mr. HEYBURN. It did, in express terms.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite sympathize, Mr. President, with the Senator in his contention that there is an abundance of land provided on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue for these buildings, and that no one of them ought to be placed on the Mall. We have been discussing for 10 or 12 years the advisability and desirability of securing the land on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue, especially from Third Street to Fifteenth Street, on which to erect public buildings in the future. We have provided an adequate appropriation of $2,500,000 for the purchase of land for these three buildings on the south side of that great avenue, and I can not imagine why the Fine Arts Commission should step in and override the opinion of Congress in this matter and further invade the Mall by placing a building thereon when we have land already acquired of sufficient area to accommodate them. I will aid the Senator in any action he may think it necessary to take to prevent that being done.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the law regarding the placing of these buildings is perfectly clear. I entirely agree with the view of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] as to that. Of course there is no idea on the part of anyone, so far as I know, of putting one of these three department buildings anywhere except on the land which Congress has directed to be applied to that use, unless Congress shall by affirmative action make a change. At the last session the Secretary of the Treasury asked that such a change be made. The provision which he asked for failed of consideration under the circumstances existing in the closing days of the session, and, in order that his request might receive consideration, I put it in the form of a bill, which I introduced at the beginning of this session, but action upon which I did not anticipate at present at all events. When, if ever, that measure comes to be considered, it will require affirmative action on the part of the Congress in order to make this result possible, and then I suppose will be the appropriate time to present the reasons in favor of the change.

I myself think that it would be a very great improvement of the plan to have that change made, but the time I suppose to present that consideration and to discuss the matter will be whenever the measure calling for that affirmative action comes up.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is much reason in the suggestion of the Senator, but it seems to me that some expensive work has been done in anticipation of the action of Congress, as is indicated by the making of the plans. I think the Senator has investigated them, perhaps; at least I received notice that they were subject to inspection, and I presume other Senators were similarly informed.

If we are to go on and plan buildings to occupy certain positions upon this land and then conclude not to place them there we shall have to reorganize the entire system. The Government now owns on Pennsylvania Avenue enough property to accommodate half a dozen such buildings in addition to the two contemplated, and there is, in my judgment, no reason why it should not do so.

I think it was a great mistake to lap these buildings around on to Fifteenth Street. One of the most desirable things before Congress in locating these public buildings is to do away with the sordid conditions on Pennsylvania Avenue. The Senate has agreed to that. We have three times pased through the Senate a bill with that idea in view; it has gone to the other House without receiving consideration there, but the views of the Senate have been clearly defined in that regard. The highest object that we could aim to attain in this respect would be the beautification of Pennsylvania Avenue, and to waste the opportunity to the extent of a single building is a mistake. Those buildings should all have their fronts on Pennsylvania Avenue and not, as the District Building has, upon a little side street, which the bill that passed three times provided for the vacation of. I think Congress should seriously consider the plans for the new buildings, even aside from the proposition to lap them over on to the Mall, and should require those buildings that are to face Fifteenth Street to be brought around so as to face on Pennsylvania Avenue, and thus advance that plan of improvement.

I am aware of the fact that it will be proper to consider the question when the bill introduced by the Senator from New York is before us, yet we may save some expense, a good deal perhaps, by sounding a note of warning at this time that Congress will not permit the existing law to be disregarded. Unless it be repealed, they had better stay their hands. I think it is perhaps opportune to express that warning here on this occasion, so that they may not go on blindly under the impression that Congress will ratify their action.

THE STANDARD OIL AND AMERICAN TOBACCO COS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) submitted by Mr. POMERENE on the 1st instant, as follows:

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey et al. v. The United States, decreed, in effect, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and 33 other constituent organizations and 7 individual defendants have united together to form and effect a combination, and as such conspired to monopolize and have monopolized and are continuing to monopolize a substantial part of the commerce among the States, in the Territories, and with foreign nations in restraint of interstate trade and commerce in violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman antitrust law; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The United States of America v. The American Tobacco Co. et al., and in the case of The American Tobacco Co. et al. v. The United States, in effect, decreed that the said the American Tobacco Co. and its co-defendants, corporate and individual, had formed and maintained a combination in restraint of trade and that they were engaged in an attempt to monopolize and in a monopolization within the first and second sections of the Sherman antitrust law; and

Whereas under the provisions of said act if the said parties or persons, or any of them, or any one for them, or anyone aiding or abetting them, have entered into or continued any contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, in the Territories, or with foreign nations, or have monopolized or attempted to monopolize or combine or conspire with any person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce as aforesaid, they are amenable to criminal prosecution; and

Whereas no criminal prosecutions have been begun against any of the said parties or persons: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring)—

(1) That it is the sense of the Senate and of the House of Representatives that criminal prosecutions shall be begun against any or all of said parties or persons who shall have, in the opinion of the Attorney General, violated the criminal provisions of said statute.

(2) That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, instructed to institute criminal prosecutions against said parties or persons for said violations, if any, where the evidence in the opinion of the Attorney General shall justify such proceedings.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the law is no respecter of persons, and the Government ought not to be. Statutes should be enforced, or they should be repealed. The poor and lowly are not above the law, and the rich and the strong in combinations ought not to be permitted to violate it with impunity.

From time out of mind the common law, which has been handed down to us by our fathers, makes contracts which are in unreasonable restraint of trade unlawful and nonenforceable, but this law is without any penalty to aid in its enforcement. The evils resulting from agreements in restraint of trade, and which tend to produce a monopoly, continued to grow in spite of the common law, and the public at large continued to suffer.

To meet them, in part, Congress, on July 2, 1890, enacted the Sherman antitrust law. It was carefully prepared. It was given the closest scrutiny by the Judiciary Committees of both the Senate and the House. After much discussion it was rewritten, and, as I am advised, by one of the most distinguished lawyers that ever graced the Senate with his presence and ability, ex-Senator George F. Edmunds. As rewritten by him it passed both the Senate and the House and was approved by the President. Twenty-one years have intervened, and no Congress since the day of its passage has amended it or repealed it.

Section 1 reads:

Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Section 2 reads:

Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

No statute was ever more painstakingly prepared, more plainly written, or more easily understood by those who want to understand it. I am speaking now of the statute generally. I recognize the fact that difficulties may arise and do arise when it comes to applying general statutes to a given statement of facts. But the ordinary man with average intelligence understands from this statute that he must not make any contract, or any combination in the form of trust, or otherwise, or enter into any conspiracy in at least unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce among the States or with foreign nations. He understands that it is unlawful to monopolize, or to attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with other persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations.

It only becomes obscure when it is to be applied to vast combinations of wealth or capital which are made for the purpose of driving competitors out of business when they seek to raise and control the prices of their commodities. And with all due respect, it seems that some lawyers have doubts as to what this statute means in proportion to the size of the fees they receive from their clients. Legal principles are the same whether applied to great or to small affairs.

If a boy in the District of Columbia were to conspire with another boy in the city of Baltimore, Md., and with another in the city of Richmond, Va., to control the supply or the price of marbles, and they were to go to any one of these lawyers who seem to have doubts about the meaning of this statute, with a $10 fee to pay for their counsel, would they not be promptly advised that such an arrangement would be a violation of this statute and if they attempted to carry out their plan would be amenable to the penalties of the criminal law? But, when you have great aggregations of wealth, gotten together in violation of the common law as it has been recognized and known for centuries, which are seeking to circumvent and evade the plain provisions of the law, and they bring into the offices of some respected lawyers large checks and ask them to bend their ingenuity and ability and great learning to find some way whereby they can evade the provisions of the law, then it is that their clearness of vision seems to become hazy and things which are clear to the average mind appear to be abstruse and unintelligible.

Any hundred-dollar country lawyer can tell what this law means. It takes a hundred-thousand-dollar lawyer to point out ways to evade its provisions.

I submit that it has always been easier to understand the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law than it is to misunderstand them. I submit that the difficulties only begin to develop when these vast corporations and their learned counsel seek to evade the letter and spirit of the law. They do not attempt to square their conduct with the law. They seek to warp the law to conform to their business.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the Justices of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. cases differed somewhat in the meaning which is to be attached to the words "in restraint of trade."

Mr. Associate Justice Harlan, to whom for many years we have been wont to look as the very fountain head of legal lore, was of the opinion that they meant "any restraint of trade." The learned Chief Justice and seven of his distinguished associates were of the opinion that they meant "any unreasonable restraint of trade." Whatever our individual opinions may be, all good citizens will accept the opinion of the majority of the court as the law of the land. But this difference of opinion from the bench can be of little comfort to the defendants in those cases, because the entire court was clearly of the opinion that the acts complained of in each of the cases were a violation of this statute under consideration.

The other day a distinguished lawyer, after the Supreme Court had handed down its opinion in the Standard Oil Co. case, is reported to have said:

The act was bad law, even though not unconstitutional, the badness being predicated on the allegation that the law does not contain an adequate description of any criminal offense.

What further description is needed? The statute says that every contract, and every combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, and every conspiracy in restraint of trade, which the Supreme Court says is unreasonable restraint of trade, shall be a violation of the law. I suppose that if he were defending some rich client charged with homicide under a statute which read, "Whoever unlawfully kills shall be guilty of an offense," the complaint would be made by him that it did not give an adequate description of the terms "unlawful" and "guilty," and that it did not say whether "whoever" referred to a white man or a black man, and that it did not describe the means or method of "killing" that was forbidden. I think this statute would be perfectly plain to him if from its provisions were excepted his own clients.

Again, the same distinguished gentleman is reported to have said that "the 'criminal intent' involved in this class of cases is a very grave legal question." Is it possible that any man who has been in the practice of the law for 40 years or more does not know what "criminal intent" means? Every elementary treatise on the subject of criminal law defines it. Every judge in the land when he charges a jury in a criminal case defines it. But, more than this, the matter of criminal intent is not a question of law; it is a question of fact, to be proven either by word of mouth or by facts direct or circumstantial, or it may be inferred by the jury from facts otherwise proven. All that is necessary to show upon this subject before any jury is that a defendant who may be charged with a violation of this law did the forbidden act. The law then comes in and presumes that every man intends the inevitable result of his acts. It is an old legal maxim that "every man is presumed to know the law." It would seem from the history of the defense which has been conducted in this class of cases that this maxim must now be amended to read:

Every man is presumed to know the law, save the Standard Oil Co., the American Tobacco Co., and similar companies, and their regularly retained counsel.

THE STANDARD OIL CO.

In order that I may be entirely correct as to the facts in this case and as concise as may be consistent with my purpose, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the following facts, gleaned for the most part from the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of the United States v. The Standard Oil Co. (173 Fed. Rep., 177):

In 1865 John D. Rockefeller owned an oil refinery in Cleveland. Later it was operated by Rockefeller & Andrews. In 1870 the successors of this firm, including John D. Rockefeller and others, owned two refineries and had a domestic oil trade in Cleveland, and conducted a warehouse business and an export trade in New York. In that year they organized the Standard Oil Co. of Ohio, with a capital stock of $1,000,000. Between that date and April 8, 1879, seven men, including John D. Rockefeller, increased the capital stock to $3,500,000, and acquired for the stockholders of that corporation, by purchase of property and by exchange of stock, more than 40 competitive refineries, and the ownership of the entire or of the controlling interest in more than 30 companies, and invested the title to all of this property and stocks in trustees for their management. They continued to acquire other properties until, in 1882, the trustees held in trust more than $55,000,000. In January, 1882, the Standard Oil Co. of Ohio, and other corporations, and limited partnerships engaged in the oil business, conveyed all their property and stocks to nine trustees during their lives and the life of the survivor of them and for 21 years thereafter. They were given power to organize other corporations for the production, refining, and dealing in oil and its products, and to buy similar and collateral businesses. They were given the right to elect the officers in all of the companies, to issue and deliver trust certificates, to supervise the business of all of the companies, to collect the dividends upon stock and the interest upon the bonds, and to distribute the sum thus derived, in dividends, upon the trust certificates. Six of the individual defendants in the case just decided by the United States Supreme Court were six of the nine trustees named in the agreement just referred to, and they issued trust certificates of the par value of $70,000,000 between 1882 and March 21, 1892, and additional certificates of the par value of $27,250,000.

It is a matter of common history in Ohio that from the very inception of the Standard Oil Co.'s business down to 1892 competitors were forced out of business by methods of unfair competition. In March, 1892, in a quo warranto proceeding begun by the attorney general of the State of Ohio, the supreme court of that State decided that the making of the agreement of 1882, and the operation of the trust thereunder, were beyond the corporate powers of the Standard Oil Co., and tended to create a monopoly, and it was enjoined from the further execution of the purposes of that agreement. On March 21, 1892, the holders of the trust certificates met and passed a resolution pretended to terminate the trust agreement. At this time the trustees held stocks in 84 companies. In the course of time changes were made, so that the number of the companies was finally reduced to 20, they succeeding to the property and business of the other 64 companies.

In 1897 contempt proceedings were begun by the attorney general of the State of Ohio against the officials of the Standard Oil Co., charging them with contempt in failing to comply with the order made by the supreme court of that State in 1892. The testimony in that case shows that the attorney of the company, in speaking upon the resolution passed by the stockholders to dissolve the trust after the rendition of the decision by the supreme court, clearly recognized that the business theretofore conducted in Ohio under the trust agreement was held by the supreme court to be a clear violation of the law of the land, and that they were enjoined from continuing the trust arrangement.

And while on this subject, it is interesting to note that the secretary of the Standard Oil Co. in a contempt proceeding against him refused to produce the books of the company or answer any questions relative to their contents, for the reason that they might tend to incriminate him. And it is further interesting to remember that during the taking of the testimony in this proceeding it was shown that many of the books, some of them running back as far as 1865, were taken from the offices of the company to the furnaces and burned, though it is only fair to state that counsel claimed that these books were burned in the usual course of their business and, I suspect, in pursuance of their usual methods.

In 1899 the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, one of the 20 companies which was continued after the decision by the Supreme Court of Ohio, had a capital stock of $10,000,000, and this stock was increased to $100,000,000, and the stock of the other 19 companies was exchanged for stock in the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, thereby again consolidating the management and control of all of these oil properties in trust under the one corporate name. Between 1899 and November, 1906, when the Government filed its suit in equity against the Standard Oil Co., the affairs of the principal company and of all of its subsidiary companies were managed by the former as the business of a single person.

From 1899 to 1907 the principal company and its subsidiary companies produced more than one-tenth of the crude oil of the country; transported more than four-fifths of the petroleum from Pennsylvania and the Indiana fields; manufactured more than three-fourths of all the crude oil refined in the United States; owned and operated more than one-half of all the tank cars used for distribution; marketed more than four-fifths of all the illuminating oil sold in the United States; exported more than four-fifths of all the illuminating oil sent forth from the United States; sold more than four-fifths of all the naphtha sold in the United States; and sold more than nine-tenths of all the lubricating oil sold to railroad companies in the United States.

To think that the company, its officials, and its attorneys did not know that the business of this concern was being conducted in flagrant violation of the law is inconceivable.

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals, on page 183, said:

Evidence in this case, too voluminous for recitation or review, has convinced (the court) that prior to 1879 the seven defendants combined to secure and obtain the control of companies competing in interstate commerce in oil and suppressed their competition; that they caused the formation and execution of the trust of 1879 and 1882; that they directed and followed that unique method of distributing the stock held in the latter trust by which it was not distributed to the majority of the stockholders for many years after 1892, while they and their associates held the control of it and of the corporations it commanded; that they caused the stockholding trust of 1899; and that by means of that trust they still hold the actual control and direction of the Standard Co. and of its subsidiary corporations, and that since 1899 they have been and still are engaged in carrying into effect and executing that trust.

And the Supreme Court, in the discussion of the merits of the case, says:

The court below held that the acts and dealings established by the proof operated to destroy the "potentiality of competition," which otherwise would have existed, to such an extent as to cause the transfers of stock which were made to the New Jersey corporation and the control which resulted over the many and various subsidiary corporations to be a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of the first section of the act, but also to be an attempt to monopolize, and the monopolization bringing about a perennial violation of the second section.

And then the Supreme Court adds:

We see no cause to doubt the correctness of these conclusions, considering the subject from every aspect—that is, both in view of the facts established by the record and the necessary operation and effect of the law as we have construed it upon the inferences deducible from the facts.

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO CO.

Briefly stated, prior to January, 1890, five concerns manufactured, distributed, and sold 95 per cent of all the domestic cigarettes and less than 8 per cent of the smoking tobacco produced in the United States. Competition then, in the language of the Supreme Court, was "fierce and abnormal." They then organized the original American Tobacco Co., with a capital stock of $25,000,000; some factories were closed, and in a little more than a year the capital stock was increased to $100,000,000; other companies were absorbed which were theretofore in competition and their factories closed. Later they set on foot a movement to control the manufacture of plug tobacco. In 1893 the president of the American Tobacco Co. approached leading manufacturers of plug tobacco and sought to combine their interests. Upon his failure to do this a ruinous competition was begun by lowering the prices on plug tobacco below its cost. Between 1893 and 1898 the American Tobacco Co., by reason of its efforts to control the manufacture and sale of plug tobacco, sustained losses aggregating more than $4,000,000. In 1898 the American Tobacco Co. organized as a New Jersey corporation, and was styled the Continental Tobacco Co., with a capital stock of $75,000,000, which was afterwards increased to $100,000,000.

In 1899 the American and Continental companies, at an aggregate cost of $50,000,000, bought and closed up 30 competing corporations and partnerships. In 1904 there was a merger of the American Tobacco, the Continental Tobacco, and the Consolidated Tobacco Cos. into one corporation, under the name of the American Tobacco Co., with a capitalization of $180,000,000.

In acquiring these companies and concentrating the control under one management, it was expressly stipulated, in many instances, that those who were bought out were not to be permitted to enter into business anew. The Supreme Court finds:

The record indisputably discloses that after this merger the same methods which were used from the beginning continued to be employed. Thus it is beyond dispute, first, that since the organization of the American Tobacco Co. that company has acquired four large tobacco concerns, that restrictive covenants against the engaging in the tobacco business were taken from the sellers, and that the plants were not continued in operation, but were at once abandoned; second, that the new company has besides acquired control of eight additional concerns, the business of such concerns being now carried on by four separate corporations, all absolutely controlled by the American Tobacco Co., although the connection as to two of these companies with that corporation was long and persistently denied.

The court further says:

Considering, then, the undisputed facts, which we have previously stated, it remains only to determine whether they establish that the acts, contracts, agreements, combinations, etc., which were assailed were of such an unusual and wrongful character as to bring them within the prohibitions of the law. That they were, in our opinion, so overwhelmingly results from the undisputed facts that it seems only necessary to refer to the facts as we have stated them to demonstrate the correctness of this conclusion. Indeed, the history of the combination is so replete with the doing of acts which it was the obvious purpose of the statute to forbid, so demonstrative of the existence from the beginning of a purpose to acquire dominion and control of the tobacco trade, not by the mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by methods devised in order to monopolize trade by driving the competitors out of business, which were ruthlessly carried out upon the assumption that to work upon the fears or play upon the cupidity of competitors would make success possible. We say that these conclusions are inevitable, not because of the vast amount of property aggregated by the combination, not because alone of the many corporations which the proof shows were united by resort to one device or another. Again, not alone because of the dominion and control over the tobacco trade, which actually exists, but because we think that the conclusion of wrongful purpose and illegal combination is overwhelmingly established:

(a) By the fact that the very first organization or combination was impelled by a previously existing fierce trade war, evidently inspired by one or more of the minds which brought about and became parties to that combination.

(b) Because immediately after that combination and the increase of capital which followed the acts which ensued justified the inference that the intention existed to use the power of combination as a vantage ground to monopolize the trade in tobacco by means of trade conflicts designed to injure others, either by driving competitors out of business or compelling them to become parties to a combination. * * *

(c) By the ever-present manifestation which is exhibited of a conscious wrongdoing by the form in which the various transactions were embodied from the beginning, ever changing, but ever in substance the same.

(d) By the gradual absorption of control over all the elements essential to the successful manufacture of tobacco products, and placing such control in the hands of seemingly independent corporations, serving as perpetual barriers to the entry of others into the tobacco trade.

(e) By persistent expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars in buying out plants, not for the purpose of utilizing them, but in order to close them up and render them useless for the purposes of trade.

(f) By the constantly recurring stipulations, whose legality, isolatedly viewed, we are not considering, by which numbers of persons, whether manufacturers, stockholders, or employees, were required to bind themselves, generally for long periods, not to compete in the future. * * *

In what position, then, do the officials of the Standard Oil Co. and of the American Tobacco Co. stand before the law? Speaking now of the officers of the Standard Oil Co., it appears that from the year 1865 to the present date substantially the same men, with John D. Rockefeller at their head, have been managing and controlling the affairs of this company.

Between 1865 and 1892 their business was conducted, if we may believe the decree of the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio and the findings of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States, in flagrant violation of the common law of the land. In 1892 the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio orders that they must not further continue their business under the trust agreement. In 1897 contempt proceedings are begun against the officials, charging them with a violation of the former order of the court. And in this proceeding they, who claim to be innocent of the violation of any law, come into court and plead that, under the Constitution, they can not be required to produce the books for inspection by the officials of the State or to testify, because by so doing they might make disclosures which would tend to incriminate them. And later a quo warranto proceeding is begun in the State of Ohio against one of the subsidiary companies, namely, the Buckeye Pipe Line Co. The trustees, under the agreement of 1882, after the decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio in 1892, pretend to pass a resolution dissolving the trust; they turn the stocks of 84 companies into 20 companies, and instead of complying with the decree of the Ohio Supreme Court, they continue to make their trust larger and greater, and finally consolidate all of these companies in the control of one giant corporation—the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey—with a capitalization of over $100,000,000.

And all of these acts have been found by the highest court of the land since 1890 to be in direct violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

And it appears from the court records that the officials of the American Tobacco Co., in the face of the positive prohibitions of the antitrust law, form a combination by which they drive competitors out of business, forbid their reentering, acquire one property after another and close them where it suits their purposes, destroying competition, raising prices, making the monopoly stronger and stronger, until vast concerns that had theretofore been legitimate competitors are subject to the control of one giant corporation with an aggregate capital of $180,000,000.

These are not idle rumors or conclusions based upon hearsay evidence, but they constitute the findings of the highest tribunal in the land formally spread upon the records of the court, where they can be read of all men. In other words, the court, by solemn decree, says that these two companies, their subsidiary companies, and the individual defendants named have violated both the common law and the laws of the Federal Government since they were first written upon the statute books in 1890.

Now, with these plain findings of fact and conclusions by the court that this statute has been violated, what reason can be given by any sworn court official for not continuing his fight against them in order to bring them to the bar of justice? What excuse can any lawmaker or any executive official give to the people of this country for a failure to enforce this law when they are every day exerting themselves to punish infractions of the law against other transgressors with less money and less influence at their command? A decent sense of self-respect requires the Government either to enforce this law or to repeal it.

These defendants and their lawyers claim that the statute is an infraction against the liberty of making contracts, that they ought to be permitted to conduct their business to suit themselves, and that they can not continue in business in the face of stifling competition.

I have some sympathy for the ignorant mountaineer, living in his fastness, breathing the free air of heaven, and feeling that he has a right, with the instruments he has made, to distill the "mountain dew" from the corn that he has raised without paying a tax, and can not understand why the Government should interfere with his occupation, but I have little sympathy with the man who has amassed great wealth, and much of it by illegal methods, who, in the face of the written statute, seeks, not by the light of truth or of reason, to comply with the law, but who devotes his time and energy and ingenuity to find some means whereby to evade the law.

And while on this subject I confess that I have but little regard for that member of my profession who will sit down at his desk, and with all the ingenuity and learning at his command, in consideration of the great fee he receives, devise some scheme whereby he can evade the law instead of directing his clients to comply with the law. He is no better and no worse than the lawyer who would deliberately sit down and try to frame up an alibi or other defense for a client who is about to commit a burglary or a highway robbery.

I want it understood that I am not now speaking of the lawyer who is conducting a defense in a case of litigation. I am speaking of the lawyer who is attempting to frame some scheme for the declared purpose of defeating the law.

And when we remember the history of the Standard Oil Co. and of the American Tobacco Co. it might be well in the interests of public morals to consider whether or not their companies and their officials have been aided and abetted in their transgressions of the law by some of the men who occupy the honored positions of attorneys and counselors of courts.

What respect have these oil and tobacco men shown for the law? What disposition have they evinced to comply with the order of the court? The history of the Standard Oil Co.

and its allied interests in Ohio and western Pennsylvania has been a continuous record on their behalf and on behalf of their officers, including John D. Rockefeller, to monopolize the oil business, and to destroy by means fair or foul where he could not buy out his competitors at his own price. His pathway is marked by a greater number of victims whose business careers he has ruined by his unlawful methods than that of any other man in the industrial history of this country, and yet he goes unwhipped of justice. But, it is said that he is not responsible; that he retired from active business more than 10 years ago.

Do you mean to tell me that a man can organize a band of law violators, furnish them with the sinews of war, serve as their captain, mark out and guide their course for a generation, and after a time, when he has grown tired of the personal strife in business, can still continue it in the same way through other agents, and receive the greater portion of the earnings of that concern, and yet not be responsible for his acts either civilly or criminally? I deny that such is the law. And, I submit that he ought not to be above the law. He is made of the same clay as other men, with more brains, much more money, and less business morals than the average man. In view of the fact that he and his companies have ignored the decree of the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio, and neither they nor the officials of the American Tobacco Co. have paid any attention to the provisions of the antitrust law as it was enacted by Congress, but all of them proceeded in open violation of the law, ought the Government now, in view of the past history of these concerns, in the very flush of victory, to rest on its oars? In my judgment, these victories will be of but little avail unless more vigorous methods are adopted on the part of the Government than heretofore against this class of law violators. If there was any doubt about the meaning of the antitrust law so far as it applied to the business methods of these concerns, there certainly could have been none after it had been construed by the United States Supreme Court in March, 1897, in the case of The United States v. The Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S., 290); or after the same court had again construed this statute in October, 1898, in the case of The United States v. The Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S., 505); or after the decision of the same court in March, 1904, in the case of The Northern Securities Co. v. The United States (193 U. S., 197).

It is my firm belief that if criminal prosecutions had been begun against those who organized the Trans-Missouri Freight Association, the Joint Traffic Association, or the Northern Securities Co. there would have been infinitely more respect paid to this law throughout the entire country, and even the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. might have been impressed with a suspicion that they were not above the law.

I do not intend by this resolution or by anything I shall say to detract for one minute from the praise which is justly due to the Attorney General for the splendid ability with which he has conducted the prosecution of the civil cases against the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. My purpose is to aid him by showing to the country that the Senate and House desire this law enforced, and that they will stand back of him with all power at their command in his fight against these great unlawful combinations to the end that the majesty of the law may be preserved. But it seems to me that the fruits of these victories will be lost to the Government and to the people unless they are quickly followed up in the most vigorous fashion.

When dangers of this kind confront us, it is neither safe to depend upon an occasional 13-inch gun nor upon a continuous popgun battery. Wars of this kind must be fought with an energy and with sinews which are commensurate with the strength, the determination, and the outlawry of the opposition. Prosecutions against them should be begun in every district in which there has been a violation of the law. I say this not out of a spirit of revenge, but in order to teach them that they, too, must obey the law.

For 21 years these defendants, a number of them all the time and many of them most of the time, have been engaged in continuous violations of the law. Is the Government now frightened at its own victories? Is it surprised that it has won? Is it to lose its courage or energy now? Are the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. too powerful for the Government to grapple with? One of these men behind the bars will do more toward restoring the majesty of the law than anything that has been done by the Federal Government in the last generation.

Speaking for myself, I think it is high time that the American people should understand whether the Stars and Stripes are to be the emblem of their power and authority or whether that emblem shall be the oil barrel or the tobacco tag.

Since this resolution was introduced I have been asked concerning its constitutionality and what, if any, precedents there were for it. My answer is:

First, that a similar resolution was introduced at the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, known as Senate resolution 48, which authorized and directed the Attorney General to institute and prosecute litigation to enforce the rights and remedies of the United States of America arising and growing out of certain land grants. If Congress has a right to pass a joint resolution of this character there ought, in my judgment, to be no question as to its authority to pass a concurring resolution. If it is right to instruct litigation in civil proceedings, it ought not to be wrong to instruct actions of a criminal nature.

Second, the Sherman antitrust law was passed in 1890. The court records show that these defendants have been continuously violating that law. Congress provided in that law for both civil and criminal remedies. The Department of Justice has sought to pursue the civil remedy, but it has ignored the criminal provisions of the statute as if they had never been written therein.

Third, the Attorney General is but a creature of the law. His office was created by Congress. He is clothed with such powers and required to perform such duties as Congress sees fit to demand of him. It can add to or it can take away from those powers whenever in its judgment proper. It is not proposed that this resolution shall have the same force and effect as a statute, but it is proposed to declare to the Department of Justice in no uncertain way that the Congress which made him and clothed him with power is cognizant of the fact that the law has been violated; that the court has so declared; that for 21 years no respect has been paid by any of those defendants to the provisions of the law; and that, in the judgment of Congress, he ought to begin criminal proceedings, and the resolution instructs him to so do in order that the majesty of the law may be preserved. If Congress has the power by law to impose upon him certain duties, it certainly ought not to be unconstitutional by resolution to say to him in a formal way that which it might do with all the sanctity and power of a statute duly and legally passed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator claim that there is power in the Senate to instruct the Attorney General as to his duty? Is not the proper procedure, if he does not properly perform his duty, an impeachment proceeding from the other side of the Capitol?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this is a concurrent resolution. It is true, if the Attorney General fails to comply with the law, impeachment proceedings may be begun; but we are not anticipating anything of that kind. We are, however, of the opinion that it is not unconstitutional for Congress to express its opinion on any subject, and to add to that expression of opinion language instructing the Attorney General to proceed.

Mr. KENYON. I thoroughly agree with the Senator that it is within the province of Congress to express its wish, but the resolution of the Senator goes further than that and instructs the Attorney General merely to do his duty, and wherein that power lies is what I am concerned with.

Mr. POMERENE. It is simply, Mr. President, pointing out to him what his duty is and instructing him to proceed. Now, let me ask the Senate and my learned friend from Iowa what harm can come from the passage of this resolution? If the Attorney General believes it to be his duty to enforce the law—and he certainly would not take any other position—then may not Congress say to him, We believe it to be your duty to enforce the law, and we instruct you to enforce the law?

Mr. KENYON. In other words, it amounts to an instruction to the Attorney General, under the Senator's theory, to do his duty. Is not that all?

Mr. POMERENE. It means simply that we are trying to stiffen up the Department of Justice by declaring to the Attorney General what our sense of his duty is. We are adding to the Attorney General's department moral force rather than legal force.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; but we are arguing from the legal standpoint. I am with the Senator on the theory that there should be criminal prosecutions, and that the only solution of the trust problem is to put some of these men behind the bars, but I believe that the Attorney General will do his duty without instructions from the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I have every hope that he will; but I remember that this law has been upon the statute books for 21 years, and in those 21 years no criminal prosecutions have been begun against any one of these companies. So it seems to me that after a Rip van Winkle sleep of 21 years, we ought not to quietly repose in the hope that this duty may be performed.

Mr. KENYON. But there have been more criminal prosecutions commenced by the present Attorney General, whom the Senator seeks to instruct, than by any other Attorney General since the act was enacted.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true.

Mr. KENYON. And the learned Senator's own governor, when he was Attorney General, in one of his reports declared that this act was practically a failure; and the act was a dead letter for a long time, as the Senator well knows. Under President Cleveland's administration but little was done. I am not raising the question to disagree with the Senator's argument, but I do not believe that where a man has done so much as has the present Attorney General to enforce this act, civilly and criminally, he should be instructed by the Senate to do his duty. I believe now that he has done so much in the enforcement of this act criminally that in those places where his name might formerly have been received with acclaim it is now received among those gentlemen, who think the earth belongs to them, with profound and blasphemous silence.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that the Attorney General was recently on such excellent terms with the classes of men the Senator has just characterized?

Mr. KENYON. I say the Attorney General came into his office from the city of New York. He had been counsel for large corporations. He never gave them his conscience. It does not destroy a man's conscience to be an attorney for a corporation. He gave up that practice and became an attorney for the people, and no man has ever performed his duty better to his clients than the present Attorney General has to his clients—90,000,000 people.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have expressly disclaimed any desire to embarrass the Attorney General, and have stated that it was my desire to aid him if possible.

The distinguished Senator from Iowa refers to the part that Gov. Harmon took in connection with this law. I am not advised as to the report to which the Senator refers, but I do know that after the trans-Missouri case had been lost in the lower court by his predecessor in office, it was Gov. Harmon who struck the corpse of that Sherman law, brought it to life, and made it a living force by his argument in the Supreme Court; and based upon that argument, the Supreme Court handed down a decision in favor of the Government.

Mr. KENYON. Why, then, did he not prosecute criminally instead of civilly?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know what the situation at that time may have been, except that that case was argued toward the latter end of the term, and the decision, if my memory serves me rightly, was not handed down until a month or two before his term expired. And what about all the years that have expired since, with the distinguished men who have been at the head of the Department of Justice? Why have they been so silent in this matter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should also like to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it was Gov. Harmon who first gave expression to the thought, "Guilt is personal," when he was urging upon the administration of President Roosevelt the criminal prosecution of the violators of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. I want also to remind the Senator from Iowa that it was a very distinguished Republican President who sanctioned the violation of this law when it came to the absorption of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co.

Mr. KENYON. So long as we are making suggestions, I want to suggest to my good-natured friend, the Senator from Ohio, that it was another distinguished Republican President, at a time when he occupied a position on the bench, who put life into the dead Sherman Act in the Addystone Pipe & Steel Co. case.

I want to suggest, further, that the only conviction criminally under the Sherman enactment has been in the Turpentine Trust case, where jail sentences—I so qualify it—have been given, and that has been under the administration of President Taft.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POMERENE. Just a moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. NELSON. I want to reply briefly to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. POMERENE. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the President has finally found a Chief Justice who overruled him in the Addystone Pipe case as to the doctrine of the common law. If the Senator from Iowa will read the decision of Judge Taft in that case and compare it with the decision of Chief Justice White in the Standard Oil case, he will find how Chief Justice White overruled Circuit Judge Taft, now President Taft.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am only too glad to yield every meed of praise to every public official who has done anything for the enforcement of the law, and I now only ask that the Senator from Iowa and others who seem to think as he does will permit the Senate and the Congress to help the head of the Department of Justice along the same line.

One word further. I am asked, Is there a precedent for this resolution? Assume that there is none. It is then time to make a precedent. The precedent is to have this law utterly disregarded. The precedent is to let the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. and their officials continue for 21 years in a lawless career. Precedent says, "Let them continue." A sense of justice requires that they shall cease and obey the law.

I hope in the interest of justice that Senators may see their way clear to support this resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution submitted by him. Is there objection?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the Finance Committee, I ask that the Canadian reciprocity bill be laid before the Senate to the end that I make some remarks on the subject. I gave notice to that effect on yesterday.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that probably he did not hear the request of the Senator from Ohio that his resolution be considered at this time.

Mr. NELSON. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Ohio made that request just a moment ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Kenyon	Root
Bailey	Cummins	Kern	Shively
Borah	Dillingham	Lea	Simmons
Bourne	Dixon	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Brandegee	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Brown	Foster	Nelson	Swanson
Bryan.	Gallinger	Nixon	Thornton
Burnham	Gamble	O'Gorman	Warren
Burton	Gronna	Overman	Watson
Chilton	Guggenheim	Page	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Penrose	Works
Crane	Johnson, Me.	Perkins
Crawford	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene
Culberson	Jones	Reed

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] has been unexpectedly called from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. BOURNE. My colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate on Government business.

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is attending a hearing and is obliged to be absent at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names; a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Ohio asked unanimous consent for its present consideration, which request has not yet been assented to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was absent when that was asked. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent——

Mr. POMERENE. As stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, I asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] yesterday gave notice that he would to-day address the Senate on the subject of the reciprocity treaty, and out of courtesy to him I will not insist upon my request being put, but will ask that the resolution lie on the table, to be called up by me at a later date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that course will be followed.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is my purpose on this occasion to discuss the pending reciprocity bill in some of its general aspects, and I intend later, on another occasion, to discuss some of the details of the bill, and especially to review a part of the President's speech at Chicago and undertake to demonstrate how utterly mistaken the President is in his views as to the effect of this bill on the agricultural interests of the country and in his view when he intimates and suggests that the farmers have been coached to make their protests against the bill.

The method pursued by the President in this case is novel, unusual, and without precedent.

Paragraph 2 of section 2 of Article II of the Constitution authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, and so forth, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

The fair construction of this paragraph of the Constitution is that the President and Senate combined can alone make a treaty with a foreign nation.

In the case under consideration the President has, through the State Department, made an agreement or treaty, which he seeks to ratify not by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, but by a mere majority of the Senate, supplemented by a mere majority of the House of Representatives, or by a mere legislative act. And in this way he evades the treaty-making provision of the Constitution. If this is proper in the case of commercial and trade agreements, why can not the same course be pursued in respect to other subjects, and thus practically transfer the treaty-making power from the President and the Senate to the President and Congress?

The trade agreement submitted by the President in this instance for ratification by Congress and not by the Senate alone has, as far as I have been able to ascertain, no precedent in our constitutional history or the history of the executive department.

The instances in which agreements or treaties have been made without submission to the Senate may be grouped under the following heads:

(1) Agreements for the settlement of claims of private American citizens against foreign Governments, but never claims of our Government against a foreign Government.

(2) Preliminary and pro tempore agreements concluding a war, suspending hostilities, and opening a way to a final peace, but never a final treaty of peace.

(3) Agreements or treaties previously authorized by acts of Congress or by treaties duly ratified. Of this kind are agreements to submit special matters to arbitration or to submit cases to The Hague Tribunal; and of this kind are also postal, copyright, and trade-mark agreements or conventions; so, also, in reference to discriminating duties and reciprocal trade agreements specifically authorized by tariff acts. (See Willoughby on the Constitution, vol. 1, pp. 467–479.)

Stripped of all verbiage and surplusage, the agreement negotiated by the President is an agreement with a foreign country to procure Congress to enact legislation in respect to the trade relations between that country and ours. In other words, to enact a limited tariff law between the two countries. While the President has the right, under the Constitution, to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient (sec. 3, Art. II, Constitution), he has no constitutional or moral right to bargain with a foreign country—to pledge himself in advance to make certain specific recommendations to Congress—to procure certain special legislation from Congress.

Such right is not accorded to the President under the treaty-making power of the Constitution, nor under any other provision of the Constitution, and the assertion of such a right is utterly destructive of the independence of the legislative department of the Government. "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States" is the language of the Constitution.

The making of such a bargain in advance, as in this case, implies not merely a naked recommendation on the part of the President according to the usual custom, but by the very terms of the bargain the President, in fact, agrees that he "will use his utmost efforts to bring about" the proposed legislation. In other words, he agreed to bring about the desired result, not by treaty, but by importunity with and pressure upon Congress to the "utmost."

A mere statement of the case shows how unconstitutional, how utterly unwarranted such action is on the part of the President. The President can recommend, he can approve or veto, but he has no right to bargain Congress away or to say to a foreign country that he "will use his utmost efforts to bring about" certain proposed legislation. Is not this a clear invasion of the legislative prerogative of Congress and destructive of its independence? Suppose the President were to enter into an agreement with some great industrial or commercial interest in our own country "to use his utmost efforts to bring about" certain proposed legislation for the benefit of such interest; no matter how meritorious such legislation might be, such conduct on the part of the President would, with one accord, be declared unconstitutional and most reprehensible. In principle, as applied to the independence of the two departments of this Government, there is no difference between such a bargain and the Canadian bargain.

The Constitution has conferred the treaty-making power upon the President and the Senate combined. Suppose the President, in negotiating a treaty with a foreign country, should also agree with the foreign country "to use his utmost efforts to bring about" the ratification of the proposed treaty by the Senate, would not such conduct on his part be regarded as an invasion of the constitutional right of the Senate? Suppose the Senate in the case of a treaty, or Congress in the case of an act, were to agree, if such an agreement could be made, that they would "use their utmost efforts to bring about" the approval of the treaty, or the act, by the President, would not such conduct on the part of the Senate, or of Congress, be a clear invasion of the rights of the executive department and militate against its independence? While the President may have the right to make trade agreements with foreign countries where previously authorized by law or treaty, he has no right to bargain for legislative influence or for legislative pressure. That power may exist in the Canadian Government, where there is a merger of the executive and legislative departments—where a responsible ministry is a part of the legislature—but under our system of government, where the legislative department is independent of and divorced from the executive department, such conduct is foreign to our system of government and destructive of the independence of the legislative department.

The conduct of the President in this case is not only novel and without precedent, but to me it seems to be of such serious moment and of such dangerous consequences that I have felt it my duty to bring it to the attention of the Senate. It seems to me the President is depriving the farmers of this country of their constitutional protection in a two-thirds vote of the Senate. This agreement would not be ratified if it were submitted to us for ratification pursuant to the spirit of the Constitution.

The proper constitutional method to have pursued in this case would have been the negotiation of a treaty by the President, the submission of the treaty for ratification by the Senate, and on its ratification to supplement it by an act of Congress to carry out the provisions of the treaty. This was the course pursued in the case of the Canadian reciprocity treaty of 1854. The making of a treaty by the President and the Senate combined would, morally and ethically at least, obligate Congress to enact the appropriate legislation to carry out the provisions of the treaty. In other words, the treaty-making power, consisting of the President and Senate, have the constitutional right, by treaty, to invoke the legislative action by Congress, as was done in 1854. But in this case only a part of the treaty-making power, the President alone, regardless of the Senate, invokes by his "utmost efforts" the legislative action of Congress, and thereby with one bound he evades the constitutional right of the Senate as a part of the treaty-making power and overleaps one of the constitutional barriers, one of the constitutional safeguards of our system of government, and blazes the way through a hitherto unexplored wilderness where none have trod before.

In this connection, I ask leave to quote from a letter of a prominent attorney in northern New York on this subject, who states as follows:

The Constitution provides the method whereby agreements with foreign powers shall be entered into. It is certainly an elemental principle that in a Government of delegated powers, where a method for the doing of an act has been prescribed in the Constitution, that method must be pursued to the exclusion of all others. It does not seem to me that by changing the form the provision in the Constitution as to treaties can be avoided. Certainly the substance of the agreement can not change its character as an agreement between foreign powers.

Suppose, in reference to fisheries, the Congress had enacted as follows:

"Be it enacted, That the following shall be the regulations as to Newfoundland fisheries:

"SECTION 1, etc.: Provided, That Great Britain passes an act making the following regulations as to Newfoundland fisheries."

Or suppose the same method was adopted in reference to sealing or as to boundaries, could this method be pursued? Would it not be a violation of the express provision of the Constitution?

The reason why the Constitution requires two-thirds of the Senate to approve any agreement with a foreign power is apparent. It was the purpose, undoubtedly, of the framers of the Constitution that no agreement should be entered into between the United States and a foreign country as to which there was any considerable opposition.

This proposed agreement is the most important which has been attempted between this country and another in a generation, and yet it is proposed to adopt it by a method never before used. You will search in Moore's International Law Digest, Wharton's International Law Digest, or Miller on the Constitution in vain to find any example of an agreement of this kind from the history of the United States down to the present time. No doubt the Congress of the United States could provide a tariff schedule as to Canada without any conditions; but if we did, then the most-favored-nation clause would apply, and it is only upon the basis that this is a reciprocity treaty that the contingency can be avoided. If it is a tariff bill, it must be general in its application; if it is a reciprocity treaty, no other nation is entitled to complain; but if it is, it must be adopted in the constitutional manner. It seems to me the privileges of the Senate, as a component part of the treaty-making power under the Constitution, are being infringed upon by this proposed method; and if it is allowed in this case, a new method of adopting international agreements has been discovered, and section 2 of Article II of the Constitution becomes a nullity.

That is from a prominent lawyer in northern New York.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Do I understand that when the Canadian reciprocity treaty of 1854 was enacted into law the President first submitted the treaty to the Senate?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly. There was first a treaty negotiated in 1854. That treaty was ratified by the Senate, and it was supplemented by a legislative act.

Mr. DIXON. Why was not that course pursued in the present case?

Mr. NELSON. I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me suggest to the Senator that it was discussed in executive session by the Senate; not in open Senate.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the chairman of the Finance Committee tell me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not the Senator from Minnesota mistaken in saying that the treaty of 1854 was ratified by legislative act?

Mr. NELSON. I am not mistaken. There was a treaty supplemented by an act of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it was ratified by the Senate alone.

Mr. NELSON. It was ratified by the Senate, and was followed by a legislative act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Afterwards.

Mr. NELSON. Afterwards.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as concerns the treaty, it was put into effect by the ratification of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. It is the rule as to tariff legislation that a treaty of that kind must be supplemented by an act of Congress, which was done in that case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, but I thought it might be understood by the suggestion that the treaty secured its validity by the combined act of the House and Senate.

Mr. NELSON. The treaty, the mere treaty, was made by the President and the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. NELSON. And that treaty was followed by an act of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was discussed in executive session.

Mr. NELSON. It was discussed in executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. And agreed to in the usual way.

Mr. DIXON. Not the bill?

Mr. NELSON. Not the bill, but the treaty was ratified by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. DIXON. Is the Senator from Minnesota a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. NELSON. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask him whether or not this treaty was ever sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. NELSON. It was sent for a little while, the Senator will remember, and it was then passed over to the Finance Committee. It was held there for a little while.

Mr. DIXON. The Committee on Foreign Relations never took any action of any kind?

Mr. NELSON. I believe not. It was put there in cold storage for a short time and then sent to the Finance Committee.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. We found that it was a revenue bill, and we brought it back and had it referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question in order to emphasize what he has just been saying, for I agree absolutely in his general conclusion. The Constitution says that the President shall have the power to make treaties——

Mr. NELSON. By and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I am not interested in that just now; but it provides that the President shall have the power to make treaties, and it says that Congress shall have the power to lay taxes and to levy duties on imports. Does the Senator from Minnesota believe that an agreement with a foreign nation which changes the duties on imports is within the treaty-making power? Does he not believe that that is a subject which is committed solely and absolutely under the Constitution to Congress?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Does he believe that the President of the United States has the right to bargain with a foreign country to secure the passage of a bill through Congress—a bill of any kind through Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not believe that the President has any power whatsoever to enter into any arrangement with Canada or with any other country upon the face of the earth touching the duties or taxes which Congress has laid upon certain imports.

Mr. NELSON. I have not before me at this moment the message of the President sent to us on the 26th of January, but I have quoted from it. The bargain is that the President will use "his utmost—his utmost—endeavor" to secure such legislation. Was there ever an instance in the history of this Government when the executive department of the Government said to a foreign nation, "I will use my utmost endeavor to get through certain specific legislation"? I might as well talk plainly, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Minnesota will look at the letter written by Mr. Fielding and Mr. Patterson to the Secretary of State, which forms the basis of this agreement, he will find that his suggestion now is verified by it, as they speak of the State Department as the Government of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. True.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I should like very much to have an answer to the question submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NELSON. What question was that?

Mr. WORKS. The question as to whether this matter could be brought about by treaty at all, because if not, then the Senator from Minnesota must be in error when he claims that that is the only way in which it can be done.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no.

Mr. WORKS. If that be true, it must be done by bill, and can not be done in any other way.

Mr. NELSON. We have a right of our own motion without the intervention of the President to pass a tariff bill relative to the tariff between our country and another country, but in this case the President has made a bargain with that country to secure such legislation.

Mr. WORKS. Is not the matter proceeding in the regular way at the present time by a bill?

Mr. NELSON. It is not in the regular way. If this is not a reciprocity agreement, the favored-nation clause will apply. If it is not in its essence and in substance a reciprocity agreement between our country and Canada, all the nations could come in under the treaty and claim the most-favored-nation clause.

Mr. President, in this connection I beg leave further to quote, bearing upon the action of the President in this case, from Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, these pregnant, apt, and germane words:

The second clause—he shall recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient—seems to have a plain and definite meaning; and the power, according to that meaning, is reasonable and just. But a signification has been given to it, during a large part of our political history, entirely different from that which must have been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, and a practice has grown up—

This relates to matters in general, and we have had a good deal of experience of it in late administrations—and a practice has grown up utterly opposed to the spirit of the organic law. The President, having access to information and being familiar with the practical working of the laws, will be sure to perceive the occasions for amendments, additions, repeals; in short, for measures which he deems necessary or expedient. These improvements and alterations he may recommend to Congress. I do not think that a fair interpretation of the clause would require him to stop with a simple suggestion; he may, doubtless, state facts and use arguments in support of his views; may endeavor to the best of his ability to show why the proposed measure is necessary or expedient. So much is plainly embraced in the word "recommend." All this is simple, satisfactory, in strict accordance not only with the letter of the clause, but also with the spirit of the whole instrument. The President uses his prior official knowledge, is convinced from that knowledge that certain measures are demanded, proposes those measures to Congress with whatever of argument he thinks proper, and there leaves the matter. He has discharged his duty, and the responsibility is now with the lawmaking power.

In this instance before he proposed the matter to Congress he made a bargain with Canada.

How different is the reality from this picture. How often have Presidents and their Cabinets seemed to regard themselves as the great legislative department and the Congress as a body expected to receive and act upon their views. Not content with recommending measures, they have frequently set themselves at work with all the appliances at their command to procure those measures to be adopted, as though the passage of certain statutes was the chief object of their administrations and the chief work of their official career. The evil is not a recent one; it had its origin immediately after the time of those Presidents who assisted in laying the foundations of the Government, but it has developed with rapidity in recent years.

While the President should not be interfered with in the discharge of those functions which are committed to him by the organic law, the Legislature should be left no less free to act within their own peculiar sphere and range of duties; the Chief Magistrate should not overstep the line which separates their respective domains. The Constitution evidently contemplates the Congress as the great legislative body and the President as the great executive officer. This is undoubtedly the essential, the fundamental, idea of the general plan. The organic law does, indeed, recognize two exceptions to the universality of this principle, and beyond those exceptions neither Congress nor President should go. One exception has just been stated.

That is the exception of recommending it to Congress.

The other exists in the fact that the President must pass upon all statutes and approve or disapprove; and that, if he disapprove, he must give his reasons therefor. This, as I have before shown, makes him in a certain sense a coordinate branch of the Legislature; and he may, therefore, and indeed must, have his opinions as to the policy of enactments which have gone through the Congress. But he can not originate measures, or debate them, or express his views upon them, except when he disapproves of a bill presented to him, or when he recommends them to the consideration of the Legislature. The spirit of the Constitution which separates the legislative and executive functions is departed from to this extent, and no more. It can not be denied, however, that the modern practice has departed from that spirit much further, and has thereby tended to destroy one of the principal safeguards of every free, constitutional government—the independence of the executive and legislative departments. The final and perfected result of this practice would be the accumulation of all governmental power in the hands of the sole executive officer; Congress would be virtually driven from its position as an independent, coordinate branch, and made the mere registrar of the President's informal decrees. This gradual change from the letter and spirit of the organic law, and the growing tendency to treat all offices as mere political rewards, and the employment of the appointing power as a means of influencing legislation, have certainly weakened the well-contrived system of checks and balances which ought to have prevented either branch of the Government from usurping the functions of any other. (Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, pp. 586–588.)

President Grant, in 1874, pursued an entirely different course from that pursued by President Taft in this instance. In 1874 the British Government presented to our Government the draft of a treaty for reciprocal trade relations between our country and Canada. President Grant, before taking any action on the proposed treaty submitted it to the Senate.

Just think of that! President Grant, before taking any action on the treaty proposed by the British Government, submitted it to the Senate of the United States for its information, for consideration and advice as to what action to take in the matter.

The following is a copy of President Grant's message:

To the Senate of the United States:

The plenipotentiaries of Her Britannic Majesty at Washington have submitted to the Secretary of State, for my consideration, a draft of a treaty for the reciprocal regulation of the commerce and trade between the United States and Canada, with provision for the enlargement of the Canadian canals, and for their use by United States vessels on terms of equality with British vessels. I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with a copy of the draft thus proposed.

I am of the opinion that a proper treaty for such purpose would result beneficially for the United States. It would not only open or enlarge markets for our productions, but it would increase the facilities of transportation from the grain-growing States of the West to the seaboard.

The proposed draft has many features to commend it to our favorable consideration; but whether it makes all the concessions which could justly be required of Great Britain, or whether it calls for more concessions from the United States than we should yield, I am not prepared to say.

Among its provisions are articles proposing to dispense with the arbitration respecting fisheries, which was provided for by the treaty of Washington in the event of the conclusion and ratification of a treaty, and the passage of all the necessary legislation to enforce it.

These provisions, as well as other considerations, make it desirable that this subject should receive attention before the close of the present session. I therefore express an earnest wish that the Senate may be able to consider and determine, before the adjournment of Congress, whether it will give its constitutional concurrence to the conclusion of a treaty with Great Britain for the purposes already named, either in such form as is proposed by the British plenipotentiaries or in such other more acceptable form as the Senate may prefer.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, June 18, 1874.

In other words, he recommended to the consideration of the Senate of the United States that treaty which was proposed to him by the British Government for trade relations with Canada. He pursued an entirely different course from that which the President pursued in this case.

While this proposed treaty contained provisions as to other matters, article 4 relates directly to trade relations, and is in substance as follows:

ART. 4. It is agreed that the articles enumerated in the Schedules A, B, and C, hereunto annexed, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada or of the United States, shall, on their importation from the one country into the other, from the 1st day of July, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876, both included, pay only two-thirds of the duties payable at the date of this treaty on the importations into such country of such articles, respectively; and from the 1st day of July, 1876, to the 30th day of June, 1877, both included, shall pay only one-third of such duties; and on and after the 1st day of July, 1877, for the period of years—which was 21 years; 21 years after the treaty comes into operation and in addition until the expiration of three years after notice of termination has been given—and on and after the 1st day of July, 1877, for the period of years mentioned in article 13 of this treaty, shall be admitted free of duty into each country, respectively.

For the term mentioned in article 13 no other or higher duty shall be imposed in the United States upon other articles not enumerated in said schedules, the growth, produce, or manufacture of Canada, or in Canada upon such other articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are, respectively, imposed upon like articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or of any other country.

Schedule A, consisting of the following natural products:

Animals of all kinds; ashes, pot, pearl, and soda; bark; bark extract, for tanning purposes; bath bricks; breadstuffs of all kinds; bricks for building and fire bricks; broom corn; burr or grind stones, hewed, wrought, or unwrought; butter; cheese; coal and coke; cotton wool; cotton waste; dyestuffs; earths, clays, ochers, sand, ground or unground; eggs; fish of all kinds; fish, products of, and of all other creatures living in the water, except fish preserved in oil; firewood; flax, unmanufactured; flour and meals of all kinds; fruits, green or dried; furs, undressed; grain of all kinds; gypsum, ground, unground, or calcined; hay; hemp, unmanufactured; hides; horns; lard; lime; malt; manures; marble, stone, slate, or granite, wrought or unwrought; meats, fresh, smoked, or salted; ores of all kinds of metals; pelts; peas, whole or split; petroleum oil, crude, refined, or benzole; pitch; plants; poultry and birds of all kinds; rags of all kinds; rice; salt; seeds; shrubs; skins; straw; tails; tallow; tar; timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, and sawed, manufactured in whole or in part; tobacco, unmanufactured; tow, unmanufactured; trees; turpentine.

Schedule B, consisting of the following agricultural implements:

What transpired with reference to this treaty? The Senate, after receiving a considerable number of protests against the proposed treaty, finally, on February 2, 1875, after some debate and discussion, adopted the following resolution in executive session:

Resolved, That it is not expedient to recommend the negotiation of the treaty for reciprocal trade with the Dominion of Canada submitted to the Senate June 18, 1874.

It thus appears that President Grant, before taking any definite action, consulted the Senate in that important matter. In this instance it seems that the President has seen fit not to consult the Senate, either individually or collectively, in the matter before insisting upon Congress passing a bill to carry out the arrangements made with Canada. Who he did consult and who guided him in the matter he has not divulged, but left us in the dark.

Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate this matter to show how considerate President Grant was not only of the rights of the Senate but of the rights of the American farmers, who were vitally interested in the provisions of the treaty.

I come next to the matter of reciprocity, Mr. President.

RECIPROCITY.

The true Republican doctrine of reciprocity was laid down by President Roosevelt in his annual message to Congress December 3, 1901, in the following words:

Reciprocity must be treated as the handmaiden of protection. Our first duty is to see that the protection granted by the tariff in every case where it is needed is maintained, and that reciprocity be sought for, so far as it can be safely done, without injury to our home industries.

President McKinley, in his last public utterance to the people of the United States, at Buffalo, N. Y., September 5, 1901, in advocating reciprocity, declared that—

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets of our increasing surplus. * * * We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

The trade agreement with Canada presented to us by the President, and for which he invokes our legislative action, ignores and does violence to the reciprocity creed of Presidents Roosevelt and McKinley, as I shall endeavor to point out to the Senate.

In 1854 we entered into a reciprocity treaty, in respect to Canada, with the British Government. That treaty was negotiated and entered into by the President, was duly submitted to and ratified by the Senate, and was supplemented by legislation to carry it into effect, a procedure entirely different from that pursued in this case. The following is the scope of that treaty. As the articles entered are very few, I shall take the time of the Senate to read them, so that Senators may see how different they are from the articles named in the present treaty:

ART. 3. It is agreed that the articles enumerated in the schedule hereunto annexed, being the growth and produce of the aforesaid British colonies or of the United States, shall be admitted into each country, respectively, free of duty.

I will read the schedule, which is a short one:

Schedule: Grain, flour, and breadstuffs, of all kinds; animals of all kinds; fresh, smoked, and salted meats; cotton wool, seeds, and vegetables; undried fruits, dried fruits; fish of all kinds; products of fish, and of all other creatures living in the water; poultry, eggs; hides, furs, skins, or tails, undressed; stone or marble, in its crude or unwrought state; slate; butter, cheese, tallow; lard; horns; manures; ores of metals, of all kinds; coal; pitch, tar, turpentine, ashes; timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, and sawed, unmanufactured in whole or in part; firewood; plants, shrubs, and trees; pelts, wool; fish oil; rice, broom corn, and bark; gypsum, ground or unground; hewn, or wrought, or unwrought burr or grind stones; dyestuffs; flax, hemp, and tow, unmanufactured; unmanufactured tobacco; rags.

This treaty was abrogated and terminated in 1866.

I call your attention to the fact wherein it differs. By this treaty, negotiated by the President and involved in this bill, the agricultural products of the farmer—wheat, rye, barley, oats, flax, and his cattle, hogs, and sheep—are all on the free list, while the products of those products of the farmers—meat, dressed meat, canned meat, ham, bacon, flour, bran, and shorts—are all on the protected list. It was not so in the treaty of 1854.

The treaty of 1854 was abrogated and terminated in 1866. It was much fairer, more equitable, and less one sided than the agreement in the case before the Senate. As an illustration of this, I will call attention to the fact that while all kinds of grain, animals, and fish were put on the free list, flour, breadstuffs, and all kinds of meat and fish products were also put on the free list. The miller, the butcher, and the packer were put on a par with the farmer in that treaty, and the farmer was given free lumber, all of which is not the case in the agreement presented to us by the President in this case.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Was coal also on the free list under the act of 1854?

Mr. NELSON. I think so. That treaty, I say, gave us free lumber. This treaty does not give us free lumber. I will discuss that later on and show what we get by this treaty. At the time that treaty was entered into Canada was developed only to a very limited extent, confined mostly to the Provinces east of Lake Superior. I call your attention to it on that map yonder. That vast country between the Great Lakes and the Rocky Mountains was then, and for years thereafter, a wholly undeveloped wilderness. Canada had at that time a population of not much over 2,000,000. Her agricultural resources, outside of the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, were scant and limited, and she was not to such an extent as now a competitor of our farmers. And yet no substantial advantage, but rather disadvantages, accrued to our country from that treaty, while it evidently proved of considerable advantage to Canada. Our exports to Canada during the last year of that treaty were over $2,000,000 less than during the first year of it, while our imports from Canada were over $34,000,000 more during the last year of the treaty than during the first year of it. The balance of trade in our favor during the first year of the treaty was over $6,500,000, while the balance of trade against us during the last year of the treaty was over $29,750,000. The following table shows the condition of our trade with Canada during the life of the treaty:

NOTE.—Plus sign indicates balance of trade in our favor; minus sign indicates balance of trade against us.

Some question was raised as to the beneficial character of that treaty. It was referred by the executive department to a certain gentleman for a report.

From the report (H. Ex. Doc. No. 96, 1st sess. 36th Cong.) made to the House of Representatives in 1860, relative to the effect of that treaty upon our trade with Canada, I quote the following words, which are as pertinent to the pending bill as they were to that treaty, namely:

CANADIAN FARMER PLACED BY TREATY ON EQUALITY WITH OUR FARMER AS TO VALUE OF FARM AND PRODUCT.

The increase in the profits of the Canadian farmer—

I am reading from the report upon the effects of the treaty of 1854—

The increase in the profits of the Canadian farmer since the treaty is well known on both sides of the frontier. The large amount which would have accrued to the United States in the form of duties has gone to his benefit in the increased value of his products and real estate.

That is the Canadian farmer.

The production of many articles has been greatly stimulated—much to his advantage—and their importations have been severely felt by our own producers along all that line of frontier through which access is naturally sought in an eastward course to our cities, manufacturing districts, and the great highway of the world.

I ask the attention of Senators, and I ask the attention of the President of the United States to this part of the report:

Contrary to the belief—

The report adds—

Contrary to the belief commonly held at the date of the treaty, the Liverpool market does not determine the standard of value of breadstuffs on this side of the Atlantic.

That was the report upon the treaty of 1854. In that case the argument was used as in this case that the Liverpool market fixed the price. This report says:

The grain-growing regions of the Northwestern States—

I am reading from the report—

have suffered more than other parts of the Union from a depression of prices in our Atlantic cities, thus caused by the influx of Canadian products. A temporary cheapness of transportation will not compensate for reduction in the value of the grain.

This report from which I quote describes in detail and with great clearness the baleful effect of that treaty upon our trade with Canada and upon our industrial progress and development. All the evils which came to our country from that treaty will come to us in a greater measure under the reciprocity scheme outlined in the pending bill.

In the debate in the United States Senate, in January, 1865, upon the resolution directing the President to serve notice of abrogation of the treaty of 1854, Senator Chandler, of Michigan, described that treaty in the following words:

If—

He says—

instead of a treaty of reciprocity this treaty had been called a treaty to encourage emigration from the United States into Canada, a treaty to encourage production in Canada instead of in the United States, it would have been more justly named.

And this language can with even more justice be applied to the reciprocity scheme negotiated by the President and embraced in the pending bill. And Senator Foote in the same debate said:

I believe it to be very generally conceded that while this reciprocity treaty, so denominated, has proved highly beneficial to the interests of the people of the British Provinces, and has contributed very largely to their interest and prosperity, it has at the same time proved injurious and prejudicial to the interest and prosperity of the people of the American States. The very title of the treaty is a misnomer. There is nothing reciprocal about it; there is nothing reciprocal in its operation; it produces no reciprocity of benefits between the two Governments. It is beneficial to one only of the contracting parties and injurious to the other.

How aptly and truly this language applies to the pending bill. There is no reciprocity in it for the farmer.

Since the abrogation of that treaty, especially since the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897, our trade with Canada has been in a most flourishing condition and steadily on the increase, with a growing balance of trade in our favor, as the following table of our exports to and imports from Canada show:

Exports to and imports from Canada.

Our total exports in the fiscal year 1910 were $1,744,984,720, and of this amount Great Britain absorbed $505,552,871, Germany $249,555,926, and Canada $215,979,226. The balance of trade in our favor on the trade with Great Britain was $234,523,099, on the trade with Canada $120,850,916, and on the trade with Germany $80,749,689. These figures indicate that our trade with Canada is in a most prosperous, healthy, and growing condition, and that there can be no urgent demand for a reciprocity that would make our country the dumping ground for all the surplus agricultural products of Canada, which will be her chief exports to this country under the reciprocity plan proposed by the President, and which will inevitably turn the balance of trade against our country and work enormous and continued injury to our farmers.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the prime minister of Canada, in a speech delivered in the House of Commons on March 7, 1911, said, among other things:

We are, above all, an agricultural people. Our object to-day is to open the door to the American market. And shall we be told that because such an arrangement is to go into effect and Canadian vegetables, cereals, and fruits can be eaten free of duty by the American people it will be all over with the Canadian Federation and even the British Empire will reel upon its foundations? Let us disregard these freaks of unreasoning panic. All that we ask is to obtain for the Canadian who works in the fields the best possible remuneration for his labor.

In these words Mr. Laurier clearly points out the chief advantage that will inure to the Canadians, "who are, above all, an agricultural people," from the proposed reciprocity plan. He sees what our President does not seem to see, that the Canadian farmers will find a market for all their surplus agricultural products here in the United States in a population of over 90,000,000 people.

The following article from the Calgary Albertan, one of the leading newspapers in the Province of Alberta—a Province which is nearly as large as the State of Texas, as you can see on yonder map—clearly and truly states the great advantages which will inure to Canada from the proposed reciprocity:

BENEFITS THAT CANADA SEES.

[Calgary Albertan.]

But all the Provinces will benefit—the maritime Provinces, with their fish and their vegetables; the Province of Quebec, with its hay; the Province of Ontario, with its barley and its dairy products; the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, with their grain; the Province of Alberta, with its grain, its cattle, its coke; the Province of British Columbia, with its timber and its coke and, eventually, with its fruit. This is Canada's great opportunity. We are asked by the special interests, by the eastern manufacturer, to sacrifice this advantage because some eastern people, who spend most of their time in the city of Toronto counting their money, believe, or say they believe, that we will sell our loyalty with our coke, part with our devotion for the motherland along with our fat steers, and annex as we sell our grain.

From the London Times of March 6, 1911, it appears that the tariff commission of Great Britain has prepared and presented a long and elaborate memorandum on the proposed reciprocity agreement. The memorandum, after giving a detailed table of all the articles in Schedule A, the free-list schedule, proceeds to state that—

While, therefore, little opportunity would seem to be given by the agreement for the United States to capture any Canadian import trade in these articles, there appears to be a large area for an increase in Canadian exportation to the United States, and consequent diversion southward of Canadian food and agricultural products that now come to the United Kingdom. In the opinion of British authorities, as set out in section E of this memorandum, one effect may be expected to be an increase in prices to the British consumer of these food and agricultural products.

There is a plain admission of the British tariff commission that the agricultural products of the Dominion instead of flowing to Great Britain, as they have done, will then flow into our country and be dumped in our midst.

In the Washington Star of March 23, 1911, appears this interview:

Farmers for pact—Representative Campbell back from tour of Canada—Makes report to Taft——

I call attention to this report because, if this report was made to President Taft, there was no excuse for him making the statements which he did in his Chicago speech——

AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS BELIEVE RECIPROCITY WOULD REMOVE THE TARIFF BARRIER.

Representative CAMPBELL, of Kansas, who has been through Canada on a "reciprocity tour" studying all the facts he could gather as to the reciprocity situation there, called on President Taft to-day to speak of the visit. Asked for his observations, he made the following statement:

"In all parts of Canada I found those who favor the treaty doing so because they said it removes what they call our tariff barrier and lets the products of their farms into our markets free of duty.

"Farmers everywhere complain that now they can not fairly compete with the American farmers, for when they send any of their products here they get our prices, less the duty. Farmers, fishermen, lumber, pulp, and paper men expect to be benefited to the amount of the tariff removed by the treaty."

"Let me give you just what some of them say:

"George Daborn, of Minudie, Nova Scotia: 'It will be worth a fortune to farmers here to have reciprocity with the United States.'

"John F. Wallace, of Hillsboro, New Brunswick: 'I believe reciprocity will be the means of opening a market to the farmers of the Maritime Provinces.'

"James W. Alvord, of Townsend Center, Ontario: 'It is just what we farmers have been looking for for 40 years, waiting with patience.'

"James Burnett, of Napinka, Manitoba: 'I think it will be of great benefit to the farmers of this country.'

"W. Fowler, Kenly, Saskatchewan: 'It will put from 5 to 25 cents per bushel on grain; also help American immigration.'"

I do not know Mr. Campbell personally, but this is a pretty fair report, and it is a pity that the President did not heed it.

"O. S. Rosenroll, of Wetaskewin, Alberta: 'To us in Alberta it means markets and increased prosperity. The value of our farms will increase, our cattle industry will flourish, and our grain crop will be worth from 10 to 20 per cent more.'"

RAISING GOOD WHEAT.

"I found that Canada produces all the grain products we produce in the United States. It is not a great corn country, but they raised about 25,000,000 bushels last year. They raise more wheat, oats, rye, and barley to the acre than we do. They are raising good wheat now as far north as the seventieth degree north latitude. The area of Canada is almost half a million square miles larger than that of the United States. The soil is fertile, the climate and the seasons favorable, and land is cheap. All they need is a market—people to eat what they produce. They have less than 8,000,000 people in the entire Dominion.

"The combined population of Minneapolis and St. Paul, Milwaukee, Chicago, Duluth, Buffalo, and New York is eight and three-quarter millions. These cities are at their door. They can get most of their products into most of these cities by water transportation.

"What about prices? Farm machinery costs about the same there as here. There is one large concern that manufactures most of the machinery in the Dominion. Binders sell for $125 to $130. The difference is in the price of grain. Take wheat. The price at Winnipeg and Minneapolis affords a fair comparison.

"July 31, 1909, the price at Winnipeg was $1.19; at Minneapolis, $1.32.

"August, Winnipeg, $1.12; Minneapolis, $1.28.

"December, Winnipeg, $0.96⅞; Minneapolis, $1.12⅜.

"January 1, 1910, Winnipeg, $1.03; Minneapolis, $1.15⅝.

"April 23, 1910, Winnipeg, $1.01⅞; Minneapolis, $1.11.
"September 24, 1910, Winnipeg, $1.01; Minneapolis, $1.12⅛.
"November 19, 1910, Winnipeg, $0.94⅜; Minneapolis, $1.04⅞.
"December 31, 1910, Winnipeg, $0.91⅜; Minneapolis, $1.03⅝.
"January 7, 1911, Winnipeg, $0.93½; Minneapolis, $1.08½.
"January 21, 1911, Winnipeg, $0.94¼; Minneapolis, $1.04⅝.

That was before the reciprocity measure was sent to Congress.

VARIATION IN PRICE.

"On the 31st of last December the price of wheat at Pembina, N. Dak., was 91 cents, while across the line in Canada, at Emerson, less than a mile away, the price was 81 cents.

"The distance by the Canadian transcontinental railways from Winnipeg through Montreal to Liverpool is 652 miles less than the distance from Minneapolis to Liverpool through New York or Boston, and the rate is a little less by the Canadian route.

"Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government believes the difference in the price on the two sides of the line is due to our tariff. His Government looks on the removal of that tariff as the best possible thing that could be done for the Canadian farmer."

This is the report that Mr. CAMPBELL, a Representative from Kansas, made to the President last March, and which the President seems to have overlooked in his Chicago speech.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want the Senator from Minnesota to misunderstand me, and I dislike this arrangement in its present form just as much as he does; but I was minded yesterday to ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] a question on this point. I did not do it, and now I want to ask it of the Senator from Minnesota, because I think the explanation ought to be made here and now.

The farmers of Canada, as I understand, are in favor of this arrangement, because they hope that, if it is adopted, they will be able to sell their products at American prices.

Mr. NELSON. In our markets.

Mr. CUMMINS. The farmers of the United States are opposed to it, because they fear that, if it is adopted, they will be compelled to sell their products at Canadian prices. Now, one or the other of these bodies of men is bound to be disappointed. Which will it be?

Mr. NELSON. If you remove the barrier it is like this: If you have two dishes of water and a pipe between them so that the water can run freely from one side to the other, they will both be brought to the same level.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. NELSON. And if you remove the tariff barrier at all, the prices of Canada will relatively increase from what they have been, and our prices will diminish.

Mr. CUMMINS. Our prices will be as great as the Canadian prices, and if the Canadian prices increase by the amount of the tariff, our prices will remain as they are.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that the Canadian farmers must be disappointed in their expectations or the American farmers are grounding their fears upon an imaginary basis.

Mr. NELSON. I leave that question to what Mr. Campbell reports.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wanted the view of the Senator from Minnesota upon it. If this arrangement results in prices going down to the Canadian point—in other words, to the export point—then the Canadian farmer can not be benefited by this arrangement.

Mr. NELSON. He will in the end, because he will get a nearer market.

Mr. CUMMINS. If, however, the prices remain the same, he will not be benefited.

Mr. NELSON. The prices would not necessarily remain the same. The Senator knows that prices are governed by local conditions. I am going to discuss that later on.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood it to be asserted yesterday, and I simply want to get a clear idea of it, that it was the opinion of men who had studied the matter most carefully——

Mr. NELSON. What is the opinion of the Senator from Iowa upon the subject?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am asking the opinion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. But I want to know the Senator's opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer that question directly when I come to speak. I do not believe in this arrangement, mark you, but I want to understand, if I can, every argument both for it and against it. Now, it can not be true that the arrangement will at one and the same time advance the Canadian prices to the American prices and reduce the American prices to the Canadian prices. It can not have those two effects.

Mr. NELSON. After I hear the Senator's argument on that point, I shall be prepared to answer him in detail.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Are they not likely to be disappointed on both sides of the line, both the farmers of Canada and those of America? Taking the illustration of the Senator, of the pipe between two vessels of water, the water will assume the same level in both vessels, and in that case the water is higher in one vessel than it was before and in the other it is lower. But, on the other hand, the Canadian farmers, as I understand the pact, have the advantage of certain free commodities that the American farmers do not have. For instance, on our side a farmer who sells wheat at the same price for which the Canadian sells it, when he buys a barrel of flour will have to pay a customs tax of 50 cents a barrel, which the farmer on the Canadian side does not have to pay; and when the man on the American side buys a beefsteak for dinner he will have to pay a cent and a quarter a pound more customs tax than the man on the other side. So that the agreement, even if an equilibrium of prices were established, in my opinion—and I will ask the Senator if he does not agree with me—leaves the American farmer the loser.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator is answering me rather than the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WARREN. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. I at once agree to the proposition of the Senator from Wyoming. The arrangement is manifestly unfair and unjust in that respect; but I wanted, if I could, to get clear in my own mind the effect of the arrangement upon the increase of price in Canada on the Canadian products and the decrease of the price on American products in our own markets. Those prices will be the same after this arrangement is adopted.

Mr. NELSON. Not necessarily. If the Senator was not here——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, since I have participated in the discussion, I will say that I was not so much in the humor in asking the question of the Senator from Minnesota to propound my own idea as to the result, but to ask whether my idea were not true. I will admit that the Senator's last observation is also true, that prices may not be the same, but, taking his illustration that they tend toward the same level and will be lower in one country and higher in the other, yet back of all that are conditions that are against the farmer of this country and in favor of the farmer of Canada through this pact.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say—I do not recall whether at the time the Senator from Iowa was in his seat or not—that, as I have stated, it was argued under the treaty of 1854, as it is being argued now, that the price of wheat was fixed by the Liverpool market, and that that treaty could not have any effect on the price of agricultural products; but a report made upon the treaty of 1854, from which I have quoted, proved that not to be true. Under the operation of that treaty the prices of agricultural products on our side of the line did not appear to be governed by the Liverpool prices.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I agree to that absolutely. There is no such thing as a world price. It is a fallacy to speak of it in those terms. I agree that the prices of some of these products in the United States have been higher at many times and for long periods than the so-called Liverpool price, less the cost of transportation and other incidental expenses; but I do believe that the Canadian farmer is being deluded by the argument that is presented here by the Senator from Minnesota, as well as the addresses or observations that I have heard quoted in the Senate coming from some of the officers and representatives of the Dominion Government. I believe that the general tendency will be toward a lowering of prices in these three or four products.

Mr. WARREN. Then, Mr. President, the Senator believes that both the American farmer and the Canadian farmer will be disappointed?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe that especially the Canadian farmer will be disappointed, for I think that the prices of products in the United States and in Canada will be practically the same; and, if the surplus is as large as depicted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], that the prices will be practically the export prices varied a little here and there by the local demand.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I want to suggest to the Senator from Iowa, suppose this reciprocity agreement should go into effect and the result of it should be that the prices of Canadian farm products should come up to the level of American prices, then, if it costs more to get the products of the American Northwest into the main markets of the United States than it would cost Canada, Canada would evidently occupy that market, would it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Canada would make a larger profit.

Mr. BORAH. It would occupy the market, would it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Canada would make a larger profit for her sales in our market than our farmers would upon the conditions stated by the Senator from Idaho. The prices, however, for the products would be substantially the same; but if it costs one farmer 10 cents more to put his product into the market than it costs his rival farmer, the former would make 10 cents less per bushel.

Mr. BORAH. Ultimately the man who could put it into the market the cheapest would occupy the market.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; but you must remember that the United States is not the only market for these products; and so long as the world takes them the price throughout the world would in a general way control the price here. The result would be, if the Canadians took our market, that we would necessarily export a very much larger percentage of our products.

Mr. BORAH. That would result in a long distance being placed between us and our market, while our market at home would be transferred to a foreign producer. The market, possibly in Chicago and other places, would be occupied by Canadian wheat and Canadian products, and if we had a market it would have to be a foreign market.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the case cited by the Senator from Idaho, of course, that would be true, although it is not true that the wheat production of Canada can reach Buffalo or Chicago more cheaply than can the wheat production of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. It certainly can reach it cheaper by water than can the product of the Northwest.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it is as far from the centers of production of wheat in Canada to water as it is from the centers of production in the United States to water. The distances, as stated by the Senator from North Dakota, are not very dissimilar.

I simply wanted to give publicity to the idea that the Canadian farmer was being lured on, as I believe, by a false hope.

Mr. NELSON. In this reciprocity agreement the American farmer is to be sacrificed for the benefit of the Canadian farmer and for the benefit of the American manufacturer, miller, and packer, notwithstanding the fact that he has been called upon, and is still called upon, to support and promote every other industry in this country by means of a protective tariff.

The treaty of 1854 proved to be of no advantage, but rather of disadvantage, to the United States, as I have already pointed out. The reciprocity plan formulated and now proposed to us by the President will prove to be a most grievous burden on the American farmer and handicap him as he has never been handicapped before, and to thus cripple him will ultimately react upon and injure the railroads and the protected industries of our country.

The agricultural conditions now prevailing in Canada are entirely different from what they were in 1854, or at any time since that date up to 10 years ago. Up to 1871 that vast domain of Canada situate between Lake Superior, James and Hudson Bays on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west was wholly and entirely an undeveloped and unsettled wilderness in the grasp of the Hudson Bay Co., which exploited the region exclusively for furs and peltries and industriously, by legerdemain—and sometimes by force—excluded all settlers and frowned upon all development. The company maintained and insisted on maintaining that immense region of fertile prairies and woodlands, of great lakes and mighty rivers, as a mere fur and game preserve, and the only white people it permitted to enter were its employees—the hunters, trappers, voyageurs, and the so-called courier du bois—and most all of these were chiefly Canadian French and Scotch highlanders, intermingled with some Orkeney men, who came to the country unmarried and who, to a large extent, took Indian wives and raised a progeny of half-breed children. Finally the company's rule culminated in the so-called Riel half-breed rebellion in 1869 and 1870. The rebellion was suppressed by British and Canadian troops, sent from Ontario and Quebec, under the lead of Col. Wolseley, now Lord Wolseley. Upon the suppression of the rebellion the British Government, by negotiation and purchase, terminated and extinguished the monopoly of the Hudson Bay Co. and took steps, though at first rather dilatory, to open the vast empire to settlement and development. There was at this time, in 1871, not to exceed 50,000 white people in the entire region between the Lake of the Woods, Winnipeg Lake, Winnipeg River, and Nelson River on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west—a distance of nearly 1,500 miles. Owing to the lack of transportation facilities, other than limited navigation on the Red, the Assiniboine, and the Saskatchewan Rivers, the process of settlement and development was for many years feeble and slow and little progress was made. In the early eighties the Canadian Pacific Railroad was extended from the west end of Lake Superior through this region to the Pacific coast, and by the end of the eighties the entire line of railroad from the eastern to the western seaboard was completed.

And since that time the line has been supplemented by many important branches and feeders in the region between the Red River and the Rocky Mountains. In addition to the Canadian Pacific, two other great transcontinental railroad lines have been, and are being, constructed through this region, to wit, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The former has completed its line from Port Arthur, at the west end of Lake Superior, to Edmonton, on the North Saskatchewan, and from thence to near the eastern foothills of the Rockies—through the very heart of this country—a distance of upward of 1,500 miles, with many important branches and feeders. The Grand Trunk Pacific—a transcontinental line—is still in process of construction, with a completed mileage, from Winnipeg westward through this region, of nearly 1,000 miles.

In the meanwhile, since the claim of the Hudson Bay Co. was extinguished, and while this great progress in railroad construction has taken place, Canada has carved out, established, and organized three great Provinces in this former game preserve of the Hudson Bay Co., namely, Manitoba, with an area of 73,732 square miles; Saskatchewan, with an area of 250,650 square miles; and Alberta, with an area of 253,540 square miles.

These Provinces are contiguous to and abut upon the States of Montana, North Dakota, and Minnesota, and exceed in area the States of Iowa, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota combined. Each of these Provinces has a local legislature, with a lieutenant governor and a responsible ministry at the head of the government, and they hold a relationship to the Dominion Government somewhat akin to the relation our States hold to the Federal Union. There are over 350,000,000 acres of land in these three Provinces, consisting of vast and fertile prairies, interspersed with patches of timber and woodlands. A full third of the area consists of first-class arable land, well adapted to and capable of producing good crops of wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax, potatoes, and grass. Another third is well adapted to and suitable for grazing and stock raising. The remaining third consists of woodlands of greater or less value, according to the amount and character of the timber. Not to exceed 3,500,000 acres of all these fertile and arable lands were under cultivation in 1900 and over 14,500,000 acres in 1910. Canada has a more liberal homestead law than ours for its Dominion lands, and large quantities of land, owned by the railroad companies, the Hudson Bay Co., and various land syndicates, can be purchased on liberal terms at a low price—much cheaper than lands of similar quality in our country.

These three Provinces have at this time a population of upward of 1,500,000, over two-thirds of whom have settled there within the last 10 years, and not less than a third of whom have come from the United States during that period, attracted by the cheap and fertile lands and the liberal homestead laws.

I may say that within the last five years over half a million of our people have gone across the border and settled on those Canadian lands. Agriculture is the chief and principal industry of these Provinces. The opening of our markets free to the farmers of these Provinces will, under the conditions prevailing there and which I have briefly pointed out, greatly stimulate immigration into these Provinces from the United States, to their gain and our loss. Cheap and fertile lands have heretofore, in later years, proved a great inducement and stimulation for emigration to Canada, in spite of the tariff embargo which has heretofore existed. If this embargo is removed and the farmers in these Provinces are given free access to our markets, there will be a rush of our people to these Provinces, and thus a double injury will be inflicted upon our country by the pending reciprocity plan—a loss in people and a loss in prices of our agricultural products and our agricultural lands.

In this connection I quote the following from the New York Sun of March 24, 1911:

EXODUS TO CANADA GROWS.

Current year's figures show 102,017 American immigrants.

OTTAWA, March 23, 1911.

The indefatigable immigration department of the Canadian Government issued a statement to-day of the immigration figures for the first 10 months of the present fiscal year. The total immigration during the period was 260,687, a gain of 57 per cent over the same period of the year before. From the United States the immigration was 102,017, a gain of 26 per cent.

The following table shows the population of these three Provinces in 1901 and the principal agricultural crops raised there in 1900 and the area of land then under cultivation:

Owing to the drought the crop of 1910 was considerably less that year than the crop of 1909.

We who have lived and are living near these Provinces and are familiar with the conditions there, believe, realize, and know that the progress and development in these Provinces will be as great and rapid during the next 10 years as in the 10 years just passed. Pending and proposed railroad construction in these Provinces, extending transportation facilities to so many unsettled localities, make this manifest beyond a peradventure.

In this connection I quote the following from the Commercial West, of April 1, 1911, a trustworthy and reliable trade and commercial newspaper of Minneapolis, Minn.:

MORE RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION ANNOUNCED.

* * * But the same banker added that the program of the big railways is this season bigger than it has ever been before. With such big expenditures in sight—as $14,000,000 by the Canadian Pacific Railway, $8,000,000 by the Chicago & North Western Railway, and $17,000,000 by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway—there will not be any dullness in the business world so far as western Canada is concerned. On the 24th an announcement was made of the projected new work of the Grand Trunk Pacific. In addition to the active work on the main line, eight new branch lines or extensions will be made. On the latter the work will be done largely by J. D. McArthur & Co., and on the main line by Floey, Welsh & Stewart. The latter will be in charge of the work between Edmonton and the coast, and they are working from both ends. Work on branch lines is as follows:

	Miles.
Calgary branch	143
Battleford branch	59
Melville-Regina branch	68
Alberta coal branch	68
Regina-Boundary branch	110
Moose Jaw branch	49
Prince Albert branch	72
Biggar to Calgary	50

In addition to this work on the branch lines, it is expected that 265 miles of new work will be done on the main line. On the line west from Edmonton there will be built 165 miles, and on the line east from Prince Rupert 100 miles will be built. On the branch lines the road into Calgary will be completed. At the present time there has been built of this branch 80 miles. The balance comprises 143 miles. Connection with Battleford will be made through the construction of a line from Oban north. The line into Regina from Melville, on which work has been done for the past two years, will be completed. In the far west a line will be built into the coal fields from Bickerdike and will be known as the Alberta coal branch.

In Southern Saskatchewan two lines will be built, one from Regina to Moose Jaw and one from Regina to the international boundary. On the latter grading was done last year, but the former project is one on which nothing has yet been done. Farther north in Saskatchewan work will be done on two lines, on the road from Biggar to Calgary and on the road from Young to Prince Albert. On the former 50 miles will be built, and on the latter 72. * * *

And the following from the same newspaper shows the great "boom" that is prevailing and impending in agricultural lands:

HEAVY LAND PURCHASES.

The extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific west from Edmonton has brought within access the big areas known as the Peace River country, of which so much has been written. From the present terminus of the line at Edson, about 120 miles west of Edmonton, a wagon road has been built into this country or that section of it known as the Grande Prairie. Settlers are trecking over this road at the present time. A railroad is planned to enter it eventually, but nothing has yet been decided. In the meantime a large population is locating on what is said to be as good a class of land as can be found on the continent, with a climate that is equal to that of southern Alberta, with the advantage over that locality in that there is more rainfall.

To the northwest of this locality now being settled there is a large area of good land adjoining it, over the Alberta boundary in British Columbia. Of this area nearly 2,000,000 acres was acquired recently by various land syndicates. These purchases were made quietly. In that Province the land is procurable by purchase direct from the British Columbia Government, but in the case of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba the lands fit for settlement are owned by the Dominion Government. The latter has followed the principle during recent years of only alienating land on terms of settlement. It has not been possible, therefore, to procure such solid stretches of land as are to be found on the northeast corner of British Columbia. Finding that the railroads were approaching this land, some adventurous land dealers took the trouble last year to thoroughly explore all the land available. The result was that they found it to be, generally speaking, well fitted for settlement, and immediately took steps to comply with the British Columbia law. It requires a cash payment of 50 cents per acre and the balance in two years, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. As soon as the land is staked and a payment made upon it the Government makes an inspection of the land and, according to grade, fixes the price at from $2 to $5 per acre.

After securing the land the companies through whose agency the explorations were made disposed of it to syndicates as follows:

	Acres.
Winnipeg syndicate (headed by Edward Brown)	106,520
Winnipeg bank manager	128,000
New York syndicate	192,000
Winnipeg syndicate (headed by Rod. McLennan)	128,000
Chicago syndicate	700,000
Thompson & Carper, Winnipeg	192,000
Lloyd's syndicate, London, England	300,000
Total	1,746,520

The parties at the head of these various syndicates will take steps to get the railroad into the territory where the lands bought are situated, and this will no doubt be the next field to which the most active settlement forces of the West will direct their attention. There can now be left no doubt of the suitability of the land purchased for agricultural purposes. For many years missions and trading posts have grown their own vegetables and raised their own wheat and ground the latter into flour. Within the past decade actual settlers have located at important points on water routes and have been amazed at the productivity of the soil and the satisfactory character of the climate. In so far as the Canadian west is concerned, this is the last corner that is available for the land speculator on a large scale. Just north of it a section of territory comprising 3,500,000 acres, just below the source of the Peace River, will be available for free homesteads. This was reserved by the Dominion Government for that purpose. Already the treck toward it has commenced, and its settlement will add to the value of the lands which have just been procured.

Winnipeg, situate on the Red River of the North, within 70 miles of our boundary, is a city of 150,000 people, and is the great railroad center and the wholesale, jobbing, and distributing center of all of that great country lying between the Great Lakes and the Rocky Mountains. That city and the three Provinces referred to occupy the same relation to the Dominion of Canada that Chicago and the upper Mississippi Valley hold to our country. The agricultural growth and development of Canada will in the future be largely confined to these Provinces, and nothing will so nourish and promote this growth and development as to give them a free market for their agricultural products just over the border in our country, instead of shipping their surplus products to Europe, several thousand miles away.

Canada raised last year, in round numbers, about 150,000,000 bushels of wheat. Of this amount, over one-third, or 60,000,000 bushels, was exported; and of the entire crop, over two-thirds, consisting of spring wheat, was raised in these three Provinces. The exportable surplus of the Dominion comes, and will continue to come, from these three Provinces. Under present conditions this surplus finds its way by rail and water to the markets of Europe, over 4,000 miles away. Open our door free to this surplus and to the fivefold greater surplus which will inevitably accrue within the next 10 years, and it will all be dumped into the near-by spring-wheat States of the Northwest—Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and adjoining States—because a higher price can be secured there than elsewhere, and the wheat market in these States will be glutted and prices depressed and lowered in consequence thereof.

The recent report of the British tariff commission on this Canadian reciprocity scheme contains this statement:

The Canadian area under wheat has, it will be seen, undergone great expansion in recent years. The average increase in the last five years was 60 per cent. At a similar rate of growth the yield should average 200,000,000 bushels in the next five years, leaving something like 120,000,000 bushels for export.

The mere fear of this reciprocity scheme has had a depressing effect. Within two weeks after the President sent in his message to Congress wheat dropped fully 10 cents per bushel in Minneapolis in consequence thereof. And some grain elevator men of Minneapolis, who had been filling up their terminal and local elevators during last fall and winter with wheat at a much higher figure than since reciprocity was proclaimed, appealed to me before the adjournment of last session to see to it that reciprocity did not go into effect until the next crop. Evidently they had no stomach for sustaining a loss of from 10 to 12 cents a bushel on the wheat they had in store, which, as a rule, they carry with their own or borrowed money.

The following table shows the production and export of wheat in the United States since 1900:

Years.	Wheat produced.	Exports of domestic.	Domestic product exported.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Per cent.
1901	748,460,218	234,772,515	31.37
1902	670,063,008	202,905,598	30.28
1903	637,821,835	120,727,613	18.92
1904[1]	552,399,517	44,112,910	7.99
1905	692,979,489	97,609,007	14.09
1906	735,260,970	146,700,425	19.95
1907	634,087,000	163,043,669	25.71
1908	664,602,000	114,268,468	17.19
1909	737,189,000	87,364,317	11.85
1910	[2]700,000,000	[2]100,000,000	14.03

[1] Owing to black rust and drought in some localities there was a partial crop failure this year.
[2] About.

From this it appears that, except in the year 1904, when there was a partial failure of crops, we have had an exportable surplus each year of from 87,314,317 bushels to 234,772,515 bushels, and that of our last year's crop we shall have about 100,000,000 bushels for export; and in these figures flour is reduced to wheat. Owing to more systematic rotation of crops and improved methods of farming and to the reclamation of large tracts of land by irrigation and drainage, consumption will not overtake production during the life of the present or the next generation, and for many years to come we shall have a large surplus to export, so that there can be no good ground for swelling that surplus with the large and increasing surplus of Canada.

The duty of 25 cents a bushel on wheat provided by the tariff acts of 1897 and 1909 has practically excluded Canadian wheat from our market. Those tariff acts have had an equally beneficial effect on our barley market and the production of barley in this country. The Democratic tariff act of 1894 placed a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem on barley, while the Republican tariff acts of 1897 and 1909 made the duty 30 cents a bushel. The following table shows the importation of barley and the production of barley in this country under these several acts:

Year ending June 30—	Importation of barley into the United States.	Production of barley in the United States.
	Bushels.	Bushels.
1895	2,116,816	87,072,744
1896	837,384	69,695,223
1897	1,271,787	66,685,127
1898	124,804	55,792,257
1899	110,475	73,381,563
1900	189,757	58,925,833
1901	171,004	109,932,924
1902	57,406	134,954,023
1903	56,462	131,861,391
1904	90,708	139,748,958
1905	81,020	136,651,026
1906	18,049	178,916,484
1907	38,319	153,597,000
1908	199,741	166,756,000
1910	4,000	162,227,000

I call attention to the fact that in 1895, under the Democratic tariff law of 1894, with a 30 per cent ad valorem rate on barley, we imported over 2,000,000 bushels of barley into the United States from Canada, particularly from Ontario, and in 1897 something over a million, while last year, 1910, we imported only 4,000 bushels of barley from Canada. In other words, the tariff has given the American farmer the barley market for the brewers and maltsters of this country.

Our production of barley in 1895 was 87,000,000 bushels, and in 1909 it was 170,000,000, and in 1910, 162,000,000.

Remove the tariff from barley and Ontario and Quebec will supply our brewers and maltsters with the barley they require, and the farmers of the Northwest will only have left to them the feed-barley market at one-half the price they are now getting for their barley. Minneapolis, Milwaukee, and Chicago as great barley markets will be destroyed.

What is true as to wheat and barley holds good, to a greater or less extent, as to oats, flax, rye, potatoes, butter and cheese, cattle, and hogs. Canada has a considerable exportable surplus of all of these products, and this surplus has heretofore found, and still finds, its chief and principal markets across the ocean in Europe. In respect to the production of oats, flax, and cattle, the three Provinces I have named and described will be as formidable competitors as in the production of wheat. Their new and virgin lands are in a high degree adapted to the production of oats, flax, and the raising of cattle. And the American railroads, with their various branches and connections in the Provinces, can and will, unhampered by the interstate-commerce law, carry the products of these Provinces to the Twin Cities or to Chicago as cheap as they can from the Dakotas and northern Minnesota; and thus the Canadian farmer, without sharing in the burdens and drawbacks of our own farmers, will have all the benefits and advantages of our home markets, and we shall have to look abroad for markets for our surplus—a surplus greatly increased and enlarged by the large and growing surplus of Canada dumped on our markets. The Canadian farmer will unload his surplus upon us, and we shall have to unload our surplus, increased by the Canadian surplus, upon Europe. And this will have a most depressing effect on our domestic market and tend to greatly reduce the price paid to our own farmers, as the facts, to which I shall call your attention, clearly show.

I quote from another newspaper at Calgary, the chief city of the Province of Alberta. The Calgary Telegram of recent date contains, among other matters, this statement:

LOWER FREIGHT FOR CANADA.

One important result of this agreement—

Referring to the reciprocity agreement—that may be expected is a reduction of grain-carrying rates. With the free entry of Canadian grains into the United States the American transportation companies will make a determined effort to secure Canada's grain trade, and lively competition will ensue between the carrying companies. That the farmers of Canada will benefit by cheaper freight rates is sure. * * *

In my opinion, Mr. President, it is an admitted fact that no Congressmen or Senators from the Northwest, which is vitally interested in the matter, were consulted in the formation of this agreement. I do not know who is at the bottom of it, but it bears the earmarks of the great railroad companies of the Northwest and of the great newspapers of the country. I do not say that they were consulted, but I say that the bill bears the earmarks of it.

No representative of Minnesota, of Wisconsin, of North or South Dakota, or Montana, or Idaho, States vitally affected and more vitally affected than any other part of the country, was ever consulted in reference to this reciprocity treaty. I mean none of the representatives in either House of Congress was consulted; but evidently representatives of other interests have been consulted, because the pact clearly bears the earmarks of it.

PRICES NOT FIXED BY LIVERPOOL.

But it is said that the dumping of the surplus agricultural products of Canada into our midst will have no tendency to reduce our domestic prices; that the price of wheat is fixed by the Liverpool market; and that our price is based upon the price of that market. This is a plausible theory, but the hard, cold facts disprove it. It is only remotely and indirectly that the Liverpool prices have a bearing on our domestic prices. The prices of cottons in Manchester have, no doubt, a bearing on the prices of cottons in this country.

The prices of iron and steel products in Birmingham and of cutlery in Sheffield have, no doubt, a bearing on the price of similar products in this country; and the price of woolens in Leeds and in Bradford has, no doubt, an effect on the price of woolens in our market. In a general way low prices abroad tend to low prices at home, and higher prices abroad tend to higher prices at home.

The local and domestic price of wheat is, to a large extent, governed by the local conditions prevailing in the territory tributary and adjacent to the various milling centers of the country. If crops in that territory are good and abundant, scant crops in remote parts will have but slight bearing on the local price. The local price will be kept high enough to prevent the local supply from going abroad. If the crop in that territory is scant, while it is abundant in remote parts, the local price is apt to reach the level that the crop from the remote parts would bring when laid down in that territory; in other words, the cost of transportation and the distance from market cut a considerable figure in either case. As a rule, the farmer who lives at remote points from the market gets a lower price than the farmer who lives near by.

There has been a marked difference for years between the price the farmers of the spring-wheat States have received for their wheat at Minneapolis and the price the farmers of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan have received for their spring wheat at Winnipeg, and a still more marked difference along the boundary line between the price the American farmer has received for his wheat at the local points on our side of the line and the price the farmers of these Canadian Provinces have received for their wheat on their side of the line.

As a rule the price of wheat at Winnipeg has been from 8 cents to 15 cents a bushel, or an average of 10 cents per bushel, lower than the price at Minneapolis, and the price of wheat at the local points along the boundary line, as clearly pointed out and demonstrated by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] in his speech of February 25, last, has been from 10 cents to 15 cents per bushel higher on our side of the line than at near-by points on the Canadian side of the line. This difference in price has been so pronounced that it has led to a considerable number of wheat-smuggling cases, and some convictions in these cases. Several Canadian farmers, on account of the higher prices on our side of the border, have smuggled wheat into our country in their farm wagons and have been caught. The Liverpool market has not been able in the past to preserve an equilibrium between the Winnipeg market and the Minneapolis market, or between the Canadian market and the American market.

Here I quote a statement from the Warren Register, a paper published in the northwestern part of Minnesota, a reliable paper, in reference to prices. I have examined the figures, and they are correct, so far as I know:

On May 2, 1910, the Minneapolis market for No. 1 northern wheat was $1.06⅞, the Liverpool market $1.04. On July 6, 1910, Minneapolis was quoted at $1.16, Liverpool at 97 cents. On September 1, 1910, Minneapolis was $1.11⅛, Liverpool at $1.08. On December 1, 1910, Minneapolis was $1.02, while Liverpool was 98 cents. This makes the average for Minneapolis on the four dates mentioned $1.09, while the Liverpool market averaged only $1.01⅜, or 7¼ cents below Minneapolis. This shows pretty conclusively that the Minneapolis wheat market does not always depend upon the Liverpool market. Barley on the English market May 11, 1911, was 67 cents, while in Minneapolis it was quoted at 80 cents to $1.02. Evidently Liverpool does not always and everywhere dictate the price of barley. On May 11 last the price of wheat was 11 cents lower in Minneapolis than it was in London, because of the slumps due to the reciprocity agitation, but even then the difference did not equal the cost of transportation from Minneapolis to Liverpool. It is probable that when we have an immense surplus for export the Liverpool market exerts an appreciable influence upon the price here, but with conditions as they have been for several years and as they are almost sure to be hereafter the home price has borne and will bear no relation whatever to the Liverpool market.

Hon. Henry Feig, a practical and experienced farmer of Minnesota, at present and for some time past State supervising inspector of country grain elevators, who has given the subject much study and attention, writes me as follows:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF SUPERVISING INSPECTOR COUNTRY ELEVATORS,
St. Paul, Minn., February 24, 1911.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As I wrote you a few days ago, I am now inclosing * * * some data that I have prepared bearing on the proposed Canadian reciprocity.

You will find a comparative list of wheat prices at Minneapolis, Duluth, and Winnipeg for No. 1 northern wheat for the crop season of 1909–10. I went back to that period, however, because of the assertion made by parties in different places that the spread in prices between our markets and Winnipeg was of recent origin and owing to the short wheat crop in the Northwest during the year 1910.

You will observe that the figures adduced in this statement flatly deny that assertion, as they show an average difference between our terminal markets and Winnipeg or Port Arthur exceeding 10 cents per bushel.

I have taken the different dates at random from the Minneapolis Market Record, which is the recognized organ of the grain trade and can be relied upon for correct price information.

The second table is one showing the comparative prices between September 2, 1910, and January 27, 1911, the day of the publication of the treaty. This shows an average difference for the period mentioned of 9⅞ cents for Minneapolis and 11⅛ cents for Duluth. * * *

Another matter I desire to call attention to right here is the fact that wheat prices in the Minneapolis market have gone down 6¾ cents between January 26 and February 21, and there is absolutely no doubt in my mind that this big slump was caused by the prospect of a speedy adoption of the treaty, and there is also no doubt that such final ratification would result in another depression of prices.

You will also find inclosed a table showing the closing price on oats, barley, and flax at Minneapolis and Winnipeg from June 24, 1910, to January 30, 1911. I made up this table from the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce report and from the daily price cards obtained from one of the commission men at Winnipeg.

You will observe that these tables show that barley averaged about 28 cents lower in Winnipeg than at Minneapolis, and flax about 25 cents lower. The price of oats usually is also higher at Minneapolis, but owing to a very short oat crop in Canada last year oats have averaged about 1⅛ cents higher at Winnipeg than at Minneapolis, this owing entirely to a local shortage of the oat crop in Canada, and in normal seasons with a bountiful oat crop there is no doubt but what there would be a difference of over 5 cents to 7 cents per bushel, which would also be wiped out by the treaty. * * *

In closing I desire to say that I hope and trust that our farmers may be spared this misfortune, because it is not only they that will suffer and be injured by this treaty if it goes through, but it is bound to affect the whole country. It will bring about conditions similar to those following 1892. There will be a strong and universal demand for a complete overthrow or change of the protective system. This will involve all sections of the country, and would doubtless mean a business revolution.

Everything should be done to avert such a catastrophe, for it would take a number of years to overcome it, and in the meantime business, industrial and agricultural, stagnation would follow.

There is no doubt but what land values would either become stagnant or perhaps even go backward in this country. * * *

Yours, very truly,
HENRY FEIG.

The following are the tables to which Mr. Feig refers in his letter. The hard, cold facts disclosed in these tables demolish the Liverpool theory, and show the value of protection to the American farmer, and further show how dangerous it would be to put our agricultural products on the free list:

Barley, 1059 cents.
Flax, 1041 cents.

SUMMARY.

On barley, 1059 cents difference for 37 days, or an average of 28 cents per bushel in favor of the Minneapolis market.

On flax, 1041 cents difference for 41 days, or an average of 25 cents per bushel in favor of the Minneapolis market.

The price of oats up to August, 1910, was about 7 cents higher at Minneapolis; after that it averaged about 1⅜ cents higher in Winnipeg.

The mere promulgation by the President of this reciprocity scheme has had a most depressing effect on the market for agricultural products, especially on the price of wheat. To demonstrate this I quote the following from the market reports contained in the Minneapolis Journal of February 10 and 11, 1911. The same issue of that paper contained a great speech in favor of Canadian reciprocity, aiming to point out to the farmers of Minnesota how it could not affect prices. Yet in the market reports of that issue of the paper I find this statement. I am reading from the paper:

WHEAT SOLD DOWN TO STILL FURTHER NEW LOWS—FAVORABLE RECIPROCITY REPORTS CAUSED SHARP DECLINE LATE TO-DAY—MAY SOLD DOWN TO 99 CENTS, LOWEST PRICE SINCE AUGUST, 1909.

MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
February 10, 1911.

Advices from the National Capitol late to-day were favorable for reciprocity with Canada. This caused a severe break in wheat prices. The near month sold down 2⅞ cents below the early high and new low prices since August, 1909, for this contract were made. May closed at 99⅛ cents, 2⅜ to 2⅝ cents below yesterday's close, and July at $1 to $1.00⅛, 2¾ to 2⅞ cents lower.

The day's reports.

The issue of February 11 of the same paper, and it is a paper that advocated Canadian reciprocity, in the market reports states:

[From the market report of the Minneapolis Journal of Saturday evening, Feb. 11, 1911.]

MAY WHEAT TO-DAY SOLD DOWN TO 98⅜ CENTS—POSSIBILITY OF RECIPROCITY CAUSED STILL FURTHER DECLINES—FLUCTUATIONS SHARP AND NERVOUS—MAY DECLINES 3½ CENTS IN TWO DAYS.

Wheat prices again to-day went to new low levels, the quotations on May being the lowest since August, 1909. The possibility—

Now listen—

The possibility of the adoption of reciprocity with Canada was largely responsible for the big break of to-day and yesterday. Pit offerings were liberal and support was lacking. More favorable weather conditions in the Southwest was another bearish factor. Reports from Washington were anything but consoling to the bears. Sentiment was strongly bearish in spite of the break of 3½ cents for the last two days, and predictions of still further new low prices were frequently heard.

The opening to-day was wild, May being quoted 99 and 99⅛ cents, one eighth of a cent lower to three-eighths of a cent higher than yesterday's close. Fluctuations were sharp and nervous. Early the near month sold down to 98⅜ cents, the new low price. This was followed by a seven-eighths of a cent rally. Prices continued to zigzag, but were not in as wide range as in the early session. May closed at 98⅜ cents, three-eighths of a cent lower than yesterday's close, and July at 99⅝ cents, three-eighths of a cent and one-half of a cent lower. Minneapolis was more active than Chicago, and prices were in wider range in this market.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask the Senator what effect this scheme or reciprocity has had on the market price of railroad shares?

Mr. NELSON. The stock of the principal railroad beneficiaries has gone up.

Mr. DIXON. The shares of the border railroads?

Mr. NELSON. Yes. There are three great railroad systems that have operated in harmony—the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, and the Burlington Roads. They will be the great beneficiaries of this Canadian reciprocity. They hope and expect to carry the Canadian products—wheat, barley, oats, and flax—down in our country to Milwaukee, Chicago, and Minneapolis, and then carry Canadian emigrants and their baggage back to the Dominion of Canada. It is no wonder that they are eager for reciprocity.

In a Minneapolis (Minn.) paper of recent date appeared the following:

H. H. King, of the Sheffield-King Milling Co., Minneapolis, has written to Senators KNUTE NELSON and MOSES E. CLAPP pointing out that if, under the proposed reciprocity treaty with Canada, 30,000,000 bushels of wheat should move to Minneapolis from western Canada it would mean a great advantage to the dairying interests of Minnesota because of the greater supply of feed that would be created, and would also mean $1,000,000 for Twin City labor, exclusive of railroad labor. Last year, Mr. King's letter points out, the Minneapolis flour mills ground 70,000,000 bushels of wheat, but they have sufficient capacity and might have ground 100,000,000 bushels had it been available.

This statement would imply that the Minneapolis millers are confronted with a shortage of wheat. This is not true. What are the facts? The flour manufactured at Minneapolis is made from spring wheat, but they put a little hard winter wheat into it, turkey red and other stuff, about 20 per cent, to fortify it. The leading spring-wheat States are Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. The following table shows the total amount of spring wheat raised in the United States and the amount raised in these three States for the last 10 years, viz, 1901–1910:

Annual production of spring wheat for 10 years, 1901 to 1910, in the United States, Minnesota, North and South Dakota.

In those spring-wheat States tributary to Minneapolis the total wheat crop of the spring-wheat States has gone from 155,000,000 bushels up to 232,000,000 bushels. There has never been a year during the last 10 years that the mills of Minneapolis could ever have utilized the whole amount of spring wheat raised in those three States in addition to the wheat raised in some of the adjoining States.

Minneapolis is right in the heart of this spring-wheat region, and its railroad connections, its elevator and warehouse facilities, and its markets are such that the largest share of this wheat—indeed most of it, except what goes to Duluth—is attracted to and marketed at Minneapolis. The mills at Minneapolis have never been able to use over half, part of the time only a third, of the wheat raised in these three States. The poorest crops within the 10-year period were those of 1904 and 1907, when there was a partial crop failure, and one-half of those crops more than equaled the amount of wheat ground by the mills at Minneapolis last year. In view of these facts and figures, it is folly to insinuate that the Minneapolis mills are suffering, or are likely to suffer, from a shortage of wheat. What they want is to have the seventy-five to one hundred million bushels of surplus wheat, raised in the Provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, placed at their free disposal, dumped in their midst, as it will be if this reciprocity scheme prevails, for they know that such an avalanche of wheat will always have a depressing effect on the Minneapolis wheat market, and will always tend to keep the price down.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. How does the Senator account for the fact that there is a very large and intelligent element in Canada absolutely and totally opposed to reciprocity? If this trade agreement shall bring such disadvantages as the Senator proclaims to the farmers of the United States, is it not fair to assume that a corresponding advantage would come to Canada? Yet the fact is that there is a large and intelligent element in Canada utterly opposed to this pact. How does the Senator account for that condition?

Mr. NELSON. I am not in touch, Mr. President, and I have not been in consultation, directly or indirectly, with any of those elements in Canada; neither do I know how the manufacturers or farmers of Canada stand, except as it appears from the report of Mr. Campbell made last March to the President.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I only know that which I read in the daily papers.

Mr. NELSON. I will concede that the reading of the Senator from New Jersey on that point is more extensive than mine.

But, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the character of this reciprocity, to the one-sided character of it. When the treaty, or the bargain, or the message of the President was first laid before the Senate the great newspapers commenced to shout reciprocity, oh, what a grand thing reciprocity with Canada was, but they were careful in every issue in those early days not to tell the farmers of the country what kind of reciprocity they were getting. They were shouting reciprocity in one issue after another, and it was only when the farmers became awake to the fact of the character of the reciprocity that some of these great papers commenced to be more moderate and more respectful.

THE NATURE OF THE PROPOSED RECIPROCITY.

I have, so far, aimed to explain and point out how the proposed reciprocity scheme would depress the price of the agricultural products of our farmers and place them at the mercy of an avalanche of agricultural products from over the border. But, aside from these considerations, the scheme is vulnerable from other standpoints. The whole burden of reciprocity is cast on the farmer. His products are the quid pro quo for the entire scheme. There is no reciprocity in any of his products. He can look for no market of any consequence for any of his products in Canada. That country will not furnish a market for our cereals, or other agricultural products. The scheme is to give the Canadian farmer our market to the end that our manufacturers can secure a part of the Canadian market for their products. Had our farmers secured free lumber, a commodity they stand in need of and have much use for, there would have been a little reciprocity in that for them. But they do not get even that. All the lumber the farmer now gets comes to him more or less planed and dressed. Scarcely any of it is wholly unplaned or undressed. It is shipped to him in that shape because of the great saving in freight—from $2 to $2.50 per thousand—which is much more than the cost of planing and dressing; and the cost of planing and dressing is much less than the duty retained in the reciprocity bill; in fact, it can be done for half of those rates, and even less, as pointed out in detail in my remarks on the lumber tariff, in April, 1909. It thus appears that there is still a considerable protective duty on such lumber as the farmer has to buy, and the same holds good as to laths and shingles, while the telegraph and telephone companies are blessed with free poles, and the railroad companies with free ties. The farmer's wheat is put on the free list, while the miller has 50 cents a barrel protection on his flour, equal to over 10 cents per bushel on wheat, besides 12½ cents per 100 pounds or $2.50 per short ton on bran, shorts, and middlings, and 17½ per cent ad valorem on cereal foods.

I think attention was called in the President's speech at Chicago to the importance to the farmers of securing cheaper bran and middling and feed stuffs, and that was to be one of the blessings of this reciprocity. But it is very odd, Mr. President, that the bill contains a duty of 12½ cents a hundred on bran, shorts, and mill-feed middlings. That is put in for the protection of the millers. It so happens that the present Tariff Board sent in a report here which shows that the price of this mill-feed bran and shorts is from two and a half to three dollars a ton cheaper at Winnipeg than at Minneapolis, and our farmers of Minnesota, on account of this protection to the millers of the bran and shorts and mill stuffs, can not even get the benefit of the cheaper market of Winnipeg. This table shows that when the President assented to the reciprocity agreement he ought to have been mindful of this matter of bran and shorts, and they should have been put on the free list. That would have helped far more than his present scheme.

I ask leave to insert this table, which gives the price of bran, middlings, and shorts at Minneapolis and in Winnipeg. It is curious to read it. I will read a little of it. Yet our farmers can not get this bran and feed stuff at Winnipeg free. The Minnesota farmer can not even have the benefit of the much cheaper mill-feed market of Winnipeg. The Tariff Board (S. Doc. No. 849, 61st Cong., 3d sess., p. 111) reports the following table of comparative prices of mill feeds at Minneapolis and Winnipeg for the year 1910:

It is a good deal cheaper in Winnipeg, and yet our farmers of northwestern Minnesota can not get even that bran for their cows without paying a tribute to the millers of $2.50 a ton. It would have been better if the President had been mindful of that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is gratifying to me to see the progress the Republican Party is making on this line. The Senator suggested just now that the farmers are paying this tribute to the millers. I remember very well when the Republican Party held it up as true gospel that the public need not worry about the tariff, because the tariff was paid by the fellow on the other side of the water. The theory then was that the tariff was paid by the foreigner. The Senator and his party have advanced marvelously. They now realize that the tariff is paid by the consumer. It is a gratifying progress that you have made.

Mr. NELSON. What is the opinion of the Senator from New Jersey on that subject? Almost everything in this reciprocity bill is on the protected list and some at a rate higher than the present tariff law.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will answer for myself, and I believe I reflect the honest, conscientious opinion of the farmers of my State of New Jersey. I would vote for free trade with Canada to-morrow—yes, better, to-day—if I had the chance.

Mr. NELSON. That might be interesting to Canada, but it is not interesting to the people of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; I believe it would advance the welfare of every man, woman, and child in the United States, and would yield a broader and more liberal and more just system. The process of the tariff has been tried until the people have rebelled.

Mr. NELSON. I take it the Senator from New Jersey is in favor of absolute free trade with all countries. If that is the case, all I can say is de gustibus non est disputandum—there is no accounting for tastes.

Cattle, sheep, and hogs are on the free list, but the moment they come into the hands of the butcher and packer he gets 1¼ cents per pound protection on the meat product. It takes the farmer from 3 to 4 years to raise a steer from a calf, and in the section of the country where I live there is from 5 to 6 months of stabling and feeding each year. The steer is free, but the butcher, who in 24 hours converts that steer into meat, gets a protection of 1¼ cents per pound.

If the slogan of the scheme is cheaper food for the masses, why put a duty on flour, cereals, meal, beef, mutton, veal, pork, hams, and bacon. We know that the middlemen, between the farmer and the consumer, get a far greater profit than the farmer. If cheaper food is one of the excuses for the scheme, why not make all food products from the farm to the mouth entirely free? Why should the farmer's cattle, sheep, and hogs be on the free list, while Armour's and Swift's ham, bacon, and other meat products be blessed with a protective duty? Why should our millers get Canadian wheat free and still have a protection of 50 cents a barrel on flour and 12½ cents per 100 pounds on shorts, bran, and middlings against the Canadian mills? The farmer's products are all on the free list, but all the tools, machinery, and implements which he uses and needs on his farm are on the dutiable list at from 15 per cent to 22½ per cent ad valorem. Even the grindstone is subject to a duty of 5 cents per 100 pounds, or $1 per ton.

The flax he raises on his farm is free, but the oil made from that flax is protected by a duty of 15 cents per gallon. His barley is free, but the maltster is protected by a duty of 45 cents per 100 pounds.

The following brief table furnishes a vivid picture of this unique, one-sided, and most unfair reciprocity scheme:

Grindstones (5 cents per 100 pounds), $1 per ton.

This table shows the present duty. It shows the articles on the free list, and it shows side by side the protected duties given on the products of those articles. In these three columns one is the column of the present tariff law of 1909, the other is the Canadian reciprocity free-list arrangement, and the other is the protected part of the Canadian reciprocity. Corn is free. Corn meal is 12½ cents a hundred; flour, 50 cents a barrel; pearled barley, one-half cent a pound; oatmeal, 50 cents a hundred. On even the oatmeal that is made from our crop of oats there is a protective duty of 50 cents a hundred, and so on. There never was a more one-sided scheme of reciprocity invented by man.

These manufacturers, millers, packers, jobbers, and railroads, who thus stand on the backs of the farmers and lustily shout for this kind of reciprocity, put me in mind of those patriots who, during the Civil War, were so patriotic that they sent their brothers and cousins to the war, but forgot to go themselves. So with these reciprocity patriots; they are so patriotic they are willing to shoulder the whole burden on the American farmer. Oh, you may carry the load; we will put the load on you; give us reciprocity and you may go to grass. [Laughter.]

The laboring men of the country are not fooled by the cry of cheaper food and are not ready to sacrifice the farmer on that account. They see that immolating the farmer and leaving the miller, the butcher, and the packer immune is of little help. Besides, they are less selfish than the big interests, and have more of a fellow feeling for the farmers, whom they regard as laborers like themselves.

PRINT-PAPER, PULP WOOD, AND WOOD PULP.

But what of the great newspapers of the country? Are they to be tempted with free pulp, free paper, and are they certain of getting what they expect and what is pro forma offered them? Let us see. The following part of the reciprocity bill prescribes the conditions under which free pulp and free news-print paper may be obtained:

SEC. 2. Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news print paper, and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper, being the products of Canada, when imported therefrom directly into the United States, shall be admitted free of duty, on the condition precedent that no export duty, export license fee, or other export charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise), or any prohibition or restriction in any way of the exportation (whether by law, order, regulation, contractual relation, or otherwise; directly or indirectly), shall have been imposed upon such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood used in the manufacture of such paper, board, or wood pulp, or the wood pulp used in the manufacture of such paper or board.

So wherever there is any restriction on the manufacturer of the pulp wood or the wood pulp or the manufacturer of paper it does not come under the provisions of this proposed law. It does not change our tariff law in that respect.

Now, what are the facts? The Crown, or Government, forests of Canada belong to the provincial governments, except in Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and the Territories, and the railway belt—40 miles wide—in British Columbia, where they belong to the Dominion Government.

The forest or timber resources of Canada are estimated to be as follows:

	Total acreage.	Publicly owned.
British Columbia	50,000,000	49,200,000
Ontario	70,000,000	52,400,000
Quebec	100,000,000	43,800,000
New Brunswick	7,500,000	2,500,000
Nova Scotia	4,000,000	None.
Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Territories	100,000,000	94,000,000

Much of the land in private ownership has been cut over, so that it is hard to say just how much timber is left on this land. Practically the same restrictive regulations exist in the case of the Dominion forest lands as in the case of the provincial forest lands. Neither the Dominion nor the Provinces sell their timber lands; they simply sell and grant licenses or permits to cut timber within certain limits. Besides, the forests in Alberta, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan, where most of the Dominion forests are situated, owing to their northern latitude, are of a rather stunted, inferior, and indifferent character, and owing to the fact that they are contiguous to the vast prairies in those Provinces, which are now being rapidly settled and developed, the entire supply will be required for the settlers on these prairies, so that no supply of any consequence of pulp wood can be looked for or counted upon from this source. It is further to be noted that in these three Provinces there are 16 forest reserves already established and subsisting.

The provincial forests are under the control of the provincial governments and not under the control of the Dominion Government; and the provincial governments are not bound or committed by anything in this bill relative to pulp wood, wood pulp, or news-print paper.

The following are the laws, rules, and regulations of the several Provinces bearing on this subject:

PROVINCE OF ONTARIO.

The Ontario legislative act of April 30, 1900, provides, among other things, as follows:

All sales of timber limits or berths by the commissioner of Crown lands which shall hereafter be made and which shall convey the right to cut and remove spruce or other soft wood, trees or timber, other than pine, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, and all licenses or permits to cut such timber on the limits and berths so sold, and all agreements entered into or other authority conferred by the said commissioner, by virtue of which such timber may be cut upon lands of the Crown, shall be so made, issued, or granted subject to the condition set out in the first regulation of Schedule A of this act, and it shall be sufficient if such condition be cited as the "manufacturing condition."

SCHEDULE A. Every license or permit conferring authority to cut spruce or other soft wood, trees or timber, not being pine, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, on the ungranted lands of the Crown, or to cut such timber reserved to the Crown on lands leased or otherwise disposed of by the Crown, which shall be issued on or after the 30th day of April, 1900, shall contain and be subject to the condition that all such timber cut under the authority or permission of such license or permit shall, except as hereinafter provided, be manufactured in Canada; that is to say, into merchantable pulp or paper, or into sawn lumber, woodenware, utensils, or other articles of commerce or merchandise as distinguished from the said spruce or other timber in its raw or unmanufactured state; and such condition shall be kept and observed by the holder or holders of any such license or permit who shall cut, or cause to be cut, spruce or other soft wood, trees or timber, not being pine, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, under the authority thereof, and by any other person or persons who shall cut or cause to be cut any of such wood, trees or timber, under the authority thereof, and all such wood, trees or timber, cut into logs or lengths, or otherwise, shall be manufactured in Canada as aforesaid.

Now, see how careful they were:

It is hereby declared that the cutting of spruce or other soft wood, trees or timber, not being pine, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, into cordwood or other lengths is not manufacturing the same within the meaning of this regulation.

PROVINCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

The British Columbia act of 1901 provides, among other things, that—

The chief commissioner of lands and works may enter into an agreement with any incorporated company empowered to manufacture pulp and paper, to grant leases of Crown timber limits, for a term not exceeding 21 years, for the purpose of cutting timber for the manufacture of wood pulp or paper, subject to such conditions, regulations, and restrictions, not provided for in any agreement or lease, as may from time to time be established by the lieutenant governor in council: * * * Provided, That the holder of any such leased lands shall erect within the Province of British Columbia and equip a pulp or paper mill, having a capacity for an output of not less than 1 ton of pulp, or half a ton of paper, for each and every square mile of timber limits included in the leasehold, and that such mill shall be kept in actual operation for at least six months in every year. * * *

All timber cut from lands leased in accordance with this section must be manufactured within the confines of the Province of Columbia; otherwise the timber so cut may be seized and forfeited to the Crown and the lease canceled.

And section 7 of this act, providing for the renewal of leases, contains the following provision:

All timber cut from provincial lands must be manufactured within the confines of the Province of British Columbia; otherwise the timber so cut may be seized and forfeited to the Crown and the lease canceled.

This act was amended by the act of March 7, 1908, which, among other things, provides that—

Leases (containing such covenants and conditions as may be thought advisable) of Crown lands may be granted by the chief commissioner of lands and works for the following purposes:

(b) For any purpose whatsoever, except cutting hay, as aforesaid, for a term not exceeding 21 years.

All timber cut under lease, special license, or general license from provincial lands lying west of the Cascade Range of mountains must be manufactured within the confines of the Province of British Columbia; otherwise the lease, special license, or general license shall be canceled.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

The Revised Statutes of 1909 and the regulations under it provide as follows:

The minister of lands and forests, or any officer or agent under him authorized for that purpose, may grant licenses to cut timber on the ungranted lands of the Crown at such rates and subject to such conditions, regulations, and restrictions as may from time to time be established by the lieutenant governor in council.

These licenses are subject to be renewed annually.

[Executive order in council.]

All licenses to cut timber are subject to a yearly ground rent of $5 per square mile or fraction of a square mile from the 1st of September.

All timber cut on Crown lands after the 1st of May, 1910, must be manufactured in Canada; that is to say, converted into pulp or paper deals or boards, or into any other article of trade or merchandise of which such timber is only the raw material. The following shall not be considered as manufactured within the meaning of the present regulations: Timber simply cut into lengths, piled, barked, or worked preliminary to the manufacture of pulp or paper, deals, or boards, or any other article of commerce; nor waney nor board timber nor timber in the form of poles; but timber completely squared and railway ties are considered as manufactured.

These orders also provide for the seizing of timber not intended to be manufactured in Canada.

New Brunswick has recently adopted the law referred to in the following report of Consul Charles A. McCullough (Daily Consular Report of May 15, 1911), namely:

PROHIBITION OF EXPORTATION OF PULP WOOD FROM NEW BRUNSWICK.

Consul Charles A. McCullough transmits a copy of an act recently passed by the Legislature of New Brunswick, to go into effect on October 1, 1911, which provides that all licenses and permits conveying the right to cut on Crown lands spruce or other soft wood, except pine or poplar, suitable for the manufacturing of pulp or paper, shall be "subject to the condition that all such timber * * * shall be manufactured in Canada * * * into merchantable pulp or paper, or into sawn lumber, woodenware, utensils, or other articles of commerce or merchandise, as distinguished from the * * * timber in its raw or unmanufactured state." The cutting of the timber into cordwood or other lengths is not to be considered as manufacturing, but the wood may be used in Canada for fuel or building purposes. If there is reason to suspect that the wood is not intended for manufacture in Canada, security may be required, and, if not given, the wood may be seized and sold. Nonobservance of the requirement to manufacture in Canada involves suspension or forfeiture of license. A copy of the act is filed for reference in the Bureau of Manufactures.

In the letter of January 21, 1911, of Messrs. Fielding and Paterson, the representatives of Canada, to our Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, forming the basis of the reciprocity agreement transmitted to Congress by the President, appears the following statement:

10. With respect to the discussions that have taken place concerning the duties upon the several grades of pulp, printing paper, etc.—mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, bleached and unbleached, news-printing paper and other printing paper and board made from wood pulp, of the value not exceeding 4 cents per pound at the place of shipment—we note that you desire to provide that such articles from Canada shall be made free of duty in the United States only upon certain conditions respecting the shipment of pulp wood from Canada. It is necessary that we should point out that this is a matter in which we are not in a position to make any agreement. The restrictions at present existing in Canada are of a provincial character. They have been adopted by several of the Provinces with regard to what are believed to be provincial interests. We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administraton of their public lands. The provisions you are proposing to make respecting the conditions upon which these classes of pulp and paper may be imported into the United States free of duty must necessarily be for the present inoperative. Whether the provincial governments will desire to in any way modify their regulations with a view of securing the free admission of pulp and paper from their Provinces into the market of the United States must be a question for the provincial authorities to decide. In the meantime, the present duties on pulp and paper imported from the United States into Canada will remain. Whenever pulp and paper of the classes already mentioned are admitted into the United States free of duty from all parts of Canada then similar articles, when imported from the United States, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask the Senator from Minnesota, if that is the case, what would be the effect of the so-called Root amendment?

Mr. NELSON. The Root amendment can have no application. I will come to that later. The President in his Chicago speech states that nine-tenths of the timber of Canada is in public ownership—that is, it is owned by the public authorities, either by the Dominion Government or by the Provinces, but mostly by the Provinces. There is only one-tenth, then, taking the President's statement, of the forest land of Canada which is not under this limitation; and as to that one-tenth of timber which is not in private ownership and which is uncut on that land, one-tenth can come into this country free without our timber going into Canada. The effect of the Root amendment is to provide that whenever the paper, or pulp, or wood from those privately owned lands in Canada come in here free ours shall go free to Canada. That part of the reciprocity they altogether forgot in the bill which they sent in here. Am I not correct in that statement, I will ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just a moment. If I understand correctly the Senator from Minnesota, the Root amendment would make this bill reciprocal in that regard but not without it.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly. There is no reciprocity in it. In the first place, under the provincial laws and regulations which I have cited the bill would be altogether inoperative; it would have no effect. Paper and pulp coming from Crown lands, from provincial lands, will be subject to the duty of the tariff act of 1909. This only applies to those lands in private ownership; and under the provisions of section 2 of this bill paper and pulp made from those lands owned by private citizens—not public lands—come in here free, without a pound of our paper or a pound of our pulp going into Canada free.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then the effect of the utterance of the Senator from Minnesota is this: That, so far as timber is concerned, we do not get that competition which might arise from a reciprocal arrangement, but so far as the agricultural products of Canada are concerned we get absolute competition at our borders—unrestricted competition so far as the products of agriculture are concerned, but not unrestricted competition so far as timber is concerned.

Mr. NELSON. The treaty is as much jug-handled in respect to the pulp and paper industry as it is in respect to farm products. The agricultural products are all to come in here free; and under the provisions of this bill, if your Michigan lumbermen own any timber in Canada their paper and wood pulp can come in here free without a pound of our paper or a pound of our pulp going free into Canada. There is not a bit of reciprocity in it. There never was a more outrageous and jug-handled affair than that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I agree perfectly with the conclusion of the Senator from Minnesota, and I am glad that he has put into the RECORD the statement which he quoted when I rose, because it has a very important bearing upon the effect, extent, and operation of this treaty.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The effect of the Root amendment is simply this, that Canadian pulp and paper can enter into the United States free when all the Provinces of Canada remove their restrictions and allow our paper and pulp to go into Canada free. That is the effect of it.

Mr. NELSON. That is it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I will have to modify that so far as my understanding of it is concerned. Under the bill Canadian paper and wood pulp will come in free. The effect of the Root amendment is that free admission into the United States shall not take effect until the President is satisfied and proclaims that our paper and wood pulp are admitted into Canada free; in other words, their paper is not to come in here free until reciprocally our paper shall go in there free. The Root amendment has little or no effect, as I understand, upon the Dominion regulations as to the Crown lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming is partially correct and, as I understand, partially incorrect.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just a moment. There is nothing in the Root amendment that compels the Canadian provincial governments to act in any way in removing their restrictions as to the exportation of wood pulp.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But it provides that if we admit the paper and pulp from that country free, no matter whether those restrictions are removed by the provincial governments or not, Canada shall allow our paper and wood pulp to go in free. That, as I understand, is the Root amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the agreement with Canada was that, until the restrictions of every Province in Canada were removed, paper from the United States could not go into Canada free; but paper made from wood in private ownership or wood other than that on Crown lands could come into the United States free under the bill, if the Root amendment were not adopted. The Root amendment provides, in effect, that until all the restrictions of Canada are removed and our paper is allowed to go into Canada free paper from Canada shall not come into this country free.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the Senator is incorrect in that statement. The bill provides that pulp or paper from wood which is grown upon lands which are not under those restrictions shall be admitted free into the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Wait just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is absolutely correct on that point.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just wait a moment. Such articles shall be admitted free when there is no export duty charged upon them.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is true, but according to the Root amendment they shall be admitted free only—

> When the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that such wood pulp, paper, and board, being the products of the United States, are admitted into Canada free of duty.

That is the Root amendment—that no Canadian paper or wood pulp, no matter from what lands in Canada it comes, shall be admitted into the United States unless wood pulp and paper from the United States is free to be admitted into Canada. Therefore the Root amendment makes reciprocal an arrangement that was not before reciprocal in any manner.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly as I understand the Root amendment, and if it was supposed that I have stated it differently, Senators have certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In fact, that is all the reciprocity there is actually.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Absolutly all the reciprocity there is in the bill, so far as wood pulp or paper is concerned, is contained in the Root amendment. The other part of the bill as it comes from the House simply reduces or takes away our tariff on Canadian wood pulp and paper. That is all it does.

Mr. SMOOT. Or, in other words, the agreement between Canada and the United States was that wood pulp and paper should be admitted free from all parts of Canada—the very words "all parts of Canada" being used—before our paper could be admitted free into Canada.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How did this part of the agreement in the original pact disappear?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield further?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How did it happen that this very provision which we are discussing and which was included in the original understanding between the commissioners of the two countries disappears from the bill? I understand it is in the bill now before the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Ask the whispering winds, but do not ask me, for nobody seems to know.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he knows how it disappeared?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The reason that is urged is that by admitting their wood pulp into this country free, without reference to anything that we may do, it is hoped that a competition may be engendered between the Crown lands and the private lands in Canada, so that as to the Crown lands they would be anxious to remove their restrictions and we could get all their paper in free.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This was part of the original understanding.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Root amendment is absolutely in harmony with the original agreement that was signed by the Canadian representatives and our own.

Mr. SMOOT. And is also in conformity with the bill now before the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is absolutely in conformity with the bill now before the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not like to intrude further upon the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I also beg pardon of the Senator from Minnesota for interrupting him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (continuing). But I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Finance Committee, if he knows how it happened that the original arrangement between the two countries was not carried out in the bill?

Mr. PENROSE. The change referred to occurred in the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. The Senator from Michigan has as much knowledge about their action as I have. I know nothing about the bill, except as it came over to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then is it the understanding of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the House Committee on Ways and Means changed the original agreement and made it conform with their own ideas, rather than with the announced agreement between the Canadian commissioners and our own?

Mr. PENROSE. They seem to have done so.

Mr. SMOOT. Without question that is exactly what they did, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The effect of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, then, is to give the Canadians free trade in their paper and their pulp and not give us free trade in the same products.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PENROSE. I will suggest, for the information of the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. This is the effect of it, Mr. President, that so long as one Province in Canada has restrictions of any kind the manufacturers of paper and wood pulp in this country can not enter into Canada without paying the present duty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the bill as it came from the House of Representatives?

Mr. SMOOT. As it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. NELSON. And the Senator from Utah might have added, when he stated that that was the effect of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, that it is also the effect of the bill as it came to us from the Finance Committee——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no.

Mr. NELSON. Without the Root amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Without the Root amendment.

Mr. NELSON. And with no explanation about this intricate subject, leaving the newspapers to think they have got a glorious thing in the paper and pulp provisions of the bill, when they have got a "gold brick."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was going to say to the Senator from Utah that he has not entirely exhausted the subject, because there is nothing in this bill, as I remember, that says that our paper or wood pulp shall be admitted into Canada, even if they do take off all export duties. I do not understand that there is any promise for the future.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that the bill as originally drawn, when I come to think of it, did provide that; but the present bill does not even allow that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is absolutely in this bill not the first hint that ever, under any conditions or any circumstances, will our wood pulp or our paper be allowed free into Canada. In this section of the bill, as I read it, there is no sentence, no word, and no phrase that can be tortured into a promise of that sort. It is simply and solely a wiping out of the protective tariff on Canadian wood pulp, as I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And its retention upon American products of similar character imported into Canada.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Minnesota, if he desires to go on, but——

Mr. NELSON. No; I am nearly through.

Mr. LODGE. I may say a word of explanation in regard to that. The agreement, as submitted by the President, placed wood pulp and print paper, valued at less than 4 cents a pound, in the list of articles to come in free. To that were appended two provisos. The first proviso stated the conditions upon which Canadian pulp and paper should come into this country free. The second proviso stated the conditions on which our wood pulp and print paper should go into Canada free. The result of those provisos was as stated by the Senator from Utah. The House omitted the second proviso altogether, so that now nothing remains except the provision for the admission of Canadian pulp wood into this country free of duty on certain conditions. There is no provision at all for our paper going into Canada free.

Mr. NELSON. Unless you adopt the Root amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, there is to be open and unrestricted competition in this country with Canadian paper and pulp under the terms of the agreement as it now stands, and no competition whatever in Canada with American paper and pulp?

Mr. LODGE. Not unless Canada chooses to follow that course. I ought to say that the Canadian bill corresponds precisely to the agreement as submitted, and carries the second proviso, which is in substance the Root amendment. As the President stated at Chicago, the Root amendment is in exact conformity with the agreement as originally made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have been told, Mr. President, that we are not to change a word or a syllable or a phrase of this agreement for fear that we may imperil it. I should like to know if we have not changed it in a very material respect, and greatly to our disadvantage?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we are not changing the agreement. We are just perfecting the agreement. We are amending the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are changing the agreement if we adopt the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not saying what may or may not be done by the Senate; but, as the matter now stands, the House of Representatives has changed the agreement in a most material way, to the disadvantage of the American people, and the direct advantage of the manufacturers of print paper in Canada.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, while we are on this subject, if the Senator from Minnesota does not object, I should like to say that the agreement not only applies to print paper, but also to all paper valued under 4 cents a pound, which includes about 85 per cent of the paper manufactured in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Paper for commercial purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Paper for commercial purposes, such as book paper, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I want to say to the Senator from Utah that there are over $20,000,000 invested in the manufacture of that kind of paper in the State that I in part represent, employing hundreds and thousands of people, and they are to be pitted in the open market against aliens without any consideration at the hands of our Government. It is a most unfair advantage, and I am amazed that the House of Representatives, which pretends to be so solicitous about the welfare of the American workingman, should have dropped from that pact or agreement the feature described by the Senator from Utah, which would have given this measure a bare semblance of equity in one particular at least.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have just read the statement of Messrs. Fielding and Patterson as to this feature of the bill relating to pulp wood and paper. I will quote a part of it again.

> We have neither the right nor the desire to interfere with the provincial authorities in the free exercise of their constitutional powers in the administration of their public lands. The provisions you are proposing to make respecting the conditions upon which these classes of pulp and paper may be imported into the United States free of duty must necessarily be for the present inoperative.

I have already read the whole statement.

Now, in reply to this—and it appears in that document—Secretary Knox, on the same date, states:

> It is a matter of some regret on our part that we have been unable to adjust our differences on the subject of wood pulp, pulp wood, and print paper. We recognize the difficulties to which you refer growing out of the nature of the relations between the Dominion and Provincial governments, and for the present we must be content with the conditional arrangement which has been proposed in Schedule A attached to your letter. (S. Doc. 787, 61st Cong., 3d sess.)

In connection with this, if Senators have followed me, they will observe that the restrictions on timber and wood and pulp wood, in the great Provinces to which I have referred, are of such character that under existing conditions the provisions of section 2 would not relieve them from the effect of our tariff law. All pulp, pulp wood, news and print paper, and other paper would have to come in from those lands and pay the duty that is contained in what is known as the Payne-Aldrich Act.

Now, what do the newspapers get out of this under the present conditions? Even the President, and I think he put the figures too high, in his speech in Chicago stated:

> The pending bill provides, as I have already stated, that in order to induce the lifting of the restrictions which are now imposed by the Canadian Provinces on wood from Crown lands, which includes about nine-tenths of the Canadian wood, * * *

All these, nine-tenths of the Canadian Crown lands, are subject to these restrictions, and while they remain not a pound of paper, or a pound of pulp wood or wood pulp could be admitted into the country free. They will be subject to the duty. And I call the newspapers' attention to the fact that all there is in this bill, under present conditions, and all there possibly could be, even without the Root amendment, is simply paper and pulp and wood pulp made from land in private ownership. That is all the paper—all the print paper and all the pulp wood and wood pulp they could get even without the Root amendment.

From all these data, which I have thus pointed out in detail, it is evident that free pulp wood and wood pulp and free newsprint paper are not secured, to any material extent, by the proposed reciprocity legislation, and are not likely to be secured in the near future, for it is not probable that any of the Provinces will voluntarily abandon their present timber policy, and the Dominion Government does not indicate that any pressure or inducement on the part of that Government will be resorted to to bring about a change. The recent action of New Brunswick indicates the temper and fixed policy of the Provinces. That is an act which was passed since the reciprocity message was sent in.

It thus appears that the newspapers will not get what some of them supposed and imagined they would get under this proposed legislation, to wit, free pulp and free paper throughout Canada. The tariff law of 1909 will still apply and govern as to most of these products of the Canadian forests. For this scant mess of pottage the great newspapers have been and are willing to sacrifice the American farmer.

IN CONCLUSION.

On the whole, it can be fairly said that there is much reciprocity in the proposed scheme for the Canadian farmer, but none for the American farmer. He is made the scapegoat, and over his shoulders some of our manufacturers look for an increased market in Canada, and some of our railroads contiguous to the boundary and with branches and connections in that country seek to obtain additional revenues by bringing the agricultural products of Canada into our markets. It grieves me, as nothing heretofore in my public life has grieved me, to note that the railroads, the millers, and the wholesalers and jobbers of Minnesota are so eager and ready to sacrifice the welfare and advantages of our farmers, who are, after all, the ultimate mainstay, for the sake of securing additional business and additional profits from Canada. It would, in the long run, be wiser, and certainly much more considerate and unselfish, if these big interests had the welfare of our northwestern farmers nearer and dearer to their hearts. Live and let live should be their motto. As for myself, my course seems clear in this matter. My youth and early manhood was spent in farm work, and I have ever since had a fondness for the farm. I know how hard the farmer's lot is; how he must work and struggle early and late, from dawn until dark. No eight-hour day for him. His life is so strenuous that the allurements of the large cities attract his children and make hired help scarce.

In pioneer days, when contending against grasshoppers, hail, drought, rust, high transportation rates, and high interest rates, it was a battle that tried men's nerves and souls. But the farmer did not flinch. He carved out a home for himself and furnished traffic for the railroads, the manufacturers, and the jobbers, and grain for the millers, and they all waxed strong from his efforts. During all these years he has been called upon and has stood ready to help all other industries by means of a protective tariff. Such a tariff until quite recently has afforded him no direct protection, and now when the tariff is about to afford him such direct protection and benefit for his industries as all the other industries have enjoyed and harvested these many years, it is curtly and in cold blood proposed to deprive him and divest him of all the direct advantages of protection. His products are to be singled out for free trade. He is blandly told that while protection is good for everybody else, it is not good for the farmer. He alone is to be an outlaw in the realm of protection. Help the railroads, prop up the manufacturers and other big interests, but let the farmer shift for himself, seems to be this modern hermaphrodite scheme of reciprocity.

I am aware of the fact that my course does not meet with the approval of some of the railroads in Minnesota, and that it does not meet with the approval of the millers, the manufacturers, and the jobbers and wholesalers of our three largest cities, yet nevertheless I can not see my way clear to desert the farmers of our State. My pulse beats with their pulse, my heart throbs with their hearts, and their soul is mine. The words of Luther at the Diet of Worms come to me on this occasion:

> Here I stand; I can do no otherwise. God help me.

THURSDAY, June 15, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, Father, Soul, everywhere present, a potent influence in the affairs of men, we wait upon Thee with open minds and hearts, that the issues of this day may be in consonance with Thy holy will, in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is a vacancy on the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, caused by the resignation of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. I desire to move the election of Mr. OSCAR CALLAWAY, of Texas, to fill that vacancy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves the election of Mr. CALLAWAY to fill the vacancy existing on the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department. Are there any other nominations?

There were no further nominations, and the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged motion. I move that the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be discharged from the further consideration of House resolution 105.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida sends to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution, and moves that the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be discharged from its further consideration. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, requested to furnish the House with copies of all complaints, allegations, and charges of every character filed in his office touching the management of the Government Hospital for the Insane within the past two years, as well as copies of any report as to conditions at such hospital made by any person or persons under the direction of the Interior Department, or any other authority on file in said department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida moves that the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be discharged from further consideration of this resolution. It becomes privileged by the fact that the committee has not reported within the seven days required by the rule.

Mr. MANN. When was the resolution introduced?

The SPEAKER. On April 18.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understood that the caucus had suspended the rule.

The SPEAKER. A caucus can not suspend a rule of the House. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Florida to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution which has been reported by the Clerk.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the resolution is now before the House, and I desire recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman how much time he will occupy.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is more than I can tell.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The reason I ask is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] would like to have a few minutes to make some statements in regard to the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to see if we can not adjust the matter about a division of time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not care to take up much time. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois want?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Twenty minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will give the gentleman 20 minutes, but I want the conclusion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, that is all right.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Oh, no; the gentleman from Florida wants 20 minutes, and then at the conclusion of my remarks 20 minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will give the gentleman 30 minutes, and then I will take 10 minutes in conclusion.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would rather the gentleman from Florida would go ahead and occupy what time he expects to now and be through with it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida is recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced, as it appears on its face, on the 18th of April of this year. I shall undertake not to weary the House. I shall not, I trust, trespass too much upon its time, but this is a question in which I feel the very deepest of interest. It involves a matter that ought to appeal to the conscience of every Member of this House, no matter what his political affiliations may be, and on account of my knowledge of some affairs in connection with it I have felt that in the interest of economic administration of government and in the interest of humanity this institution must be thoroughly investigated and such remedies applied as will correct the existing evils. I offered this resolution for the purpose of ascertaining facts from the department having this bureau under its control, but the committee has not seen fit to consider it. The department has made no effort to answer. I do not blame the department, because it probably has not been called to the attention of those in charge; and, in order that the House may fully understand, I desire to say that I offered another resolution on this same subject, seeking an investigation of this institution, which went to the Committee on Rules of this House, and has been there for some little time. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what rules govern the Committee on Rules. I do know, and it struck me as a rather queer proceeding, that in this case the persons to be investigated were sent for. They were heard on the question as to whether or not they ought to be investigated. Now, an investigation of the Steel Trust has been ordered at the instance of the Committee on Rules. I do not object to that; I think it ought to be investigated. But I do not understand that Mr. Morgan or any of the gentlemen controlling that trust were sent for by the Committee on Rules to be interrogated with reference to their desires as to being investigated. The Sugar Trust is also to be investigated. I do not know that Mr. Atkins, the acting president—if that is his name—or any other person interested in the Sugar Trust was sent for and interrogated as to the desirability of their being investigated.

There is also a resolution here, reported from that committee and acted on by the House, to investigate certain affairs of the District of Columbia—the corporations, tax assessments, and so forth. I do not understand that the Commissioners of the District and the officials of the street railway companies were sent for and their wishes with reference to their being investigated ascertained; but in this particular case, a case, Mr. Speaker, which involves in it questions reaching higher than any question of dollars and cents, which has for its object the ascertainment of the treatment of about 3,000 human beings, black, white, male and female, old and young, who unfortunately have become bereft of their reason, the officials in whose charge these unfortunates are, who are sought to be investigated, are sent for by the Committee on Rules. This is a resolution which ought to appeal, as I said in the beginning, to every man on this floor, no matter what his business in life or his political affiliations may be, and I want to say here, Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-ninth Congress, a Republican House, a Republican Committee on Rules, upon a resolution offered by me, ordered an investigation of this institution. The report came in the House so late in the last days of the dying Congress that absolutely nothing could be done, and I hold in my hand now the testimony taken by that investigating committee, covering about 2,000 pages, at a cost to the Government of about $30,000, I am told—all wasted, all gone, every dollar of it expended, and nothing accomplished, except one thing. It did appear on this investigation that the superintendent of that asylum was his own disbursing officer, expending more than a million dollars a year, with practically no check upon the manner of its expenditure. That looked a little too tough, so we find in an appropriation following a little later a provision that there should be a disbursing officer at the Government Hospital for the Insane, coupled with the condition that the superintendent should appoint him and that he should be under the supervision of the superintendent. The superintendent appointed a young man who occupied some sort of a confidential relation to him, whose salary at that time was $1,500, and he put his salary at $2,500 a year. So the net result of the expenditure of $30,000 in this investigation is the raising of the salary of one man $1,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, my resolution now before the Rules Committee recited the facts of this former investigation, called attention to the fact that the reports were made too late for action, and simply asked that a new committee should be appointed with power to take such small additional testimony as in their judgment was proper, and report that in connection with this testimony to this House and let it be acted upon. I have stated to members of the Rules Committee—I do not know but what I stated it to the entire committee—that the additional cost would not exceed $500, and I was perfectly willing, and am now, that the expenditure should be limited to $500. Yet, Mr. Speaker, here is a resolution involving the happiness, if such a thing can come to people so afflicted; involving the comfort; yea, in some instances involving the lives, of some of these 3,000 people, and the Rules Committee can not afford to spend $500 to ascertain the relief that is needed, and give the House an opportunity to extend that relief.

And yet they go down into the Treasury of the United States for $25,000 on a fishing expedition against the Sugar Trust. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what measure of proof these gentlemen require. I was told by one Member that I ought to submit proof sufficient that if it was a criminal charge it would warrant a grand jury in returning an indictment. Now, I do not know much about the law—never pretended to. I have had a license to practice, and have been hanging around courthouses for about 30 years, and have absorbed some little information along those lines by contact with other lawyers. I do not profess to be in a class with the gentlemen who compose the Rules Committee, and particularly the gentleman who gave me that valuable information; but, Mr. Speaker, I have heard somewhere, I have heard it intimated, and I have absorbed it, and it has been with me for a good long number of years. I may be wrong, but I have heard of a proposition something like this: I have been told it is good law that when a condition is once shown to exist, that condition is presumed to continue until the contrary is made to appear by competent proof.

I put all of this testimony before the Rules Committee, showing, Mr. Speaker, here almost under the Dome of this Capitol, a most disgraceful condition of affairs, and one which I dare say does not exist in any like institution anywhere in this country. I have said, and I say now, that the record in this case, as drawn out in this testimony, is one long trail of cruel mistreatment of these unfortunate people. Murders have been committed over there, escapes are frequent, any quantity of witnesses testified to the bad condition of the food, and other things of that kind, and yet our friends—I agree with them you know; I am in this economy business myself now; I never have been much of an economist, do not claim to be, but I remember, and you all remember, that our distinguished Speaker, for whom I entertain the very highest regard, and I think he did what was proper, I know he did from his viewpoint; I do not know if I would have done it, I am not so good a man as my friend; but he declined to use an automobile at Government expense because he said it was no part of the duty of the Government to furnish it to him. Here is a little subordinate officer over there, a bachelor, with eight or nine rooms for his personal use, although it is very crowded in this institution, there being a scarcity of room, and they say they can not take care of the inmates but need more buildings and rooms—here is this man with eight or nine rooms in his own private apartment, with a special cook for himself individually, and a servant in his apartment, besides the coachman and chauffeur—I believe that is what he is called—and he has two automobiles, a carriage, and a pair of horses, and the electric cars run right by his door to all parts of the city. And this is all furnished at the expense of the Government, in addition to his salary. Now, that is economy with a vengeance. Here is the next highest officer of the Government—I think in point of dignity the Speakership is next to the Presidency—and if any officer of this Government ought to be furnished with a conveyance to go about over the city befitting the dignity of his place it is the Speaker, but he has none; and here is this little subaltern over there, who is an absolute dictator, and who exercises—and I assert this without fear of any sort of contradiction—this record shows that this man, with the power given him under the law and the rules of the Interior Department, is the greatest autocrat in America to-day. He has no boss, he goes and comes as he pleases, has all of these conveyances at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, and yet my friends, who are extremely economical, think that this ought to continue, I presume.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question; yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the management of this institution come under the District Commissioners in any form?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are in no way responsible for the things charged by the gentleman?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not in the slightest. The institution was originally established, I will say to my friend and for the benefit of the House——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Pardon me, just one more question—then the government of this institution is wholly with the Department of the Interior?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the District sends patients to the institution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am going to explain that; yes. The institution was originally established as a hospital for the insane of the Army and Navy. In the course of time the statute was amended by which the indigent insane of the District were admitted, and finally the criminal insane of the whole country.

That is to say, persons arraigned in Federal courts who are found to be insane are sent there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this record shows other things. It shows that the criminal insane are permitted to mingle with the innocent insane, and all authorities agree that this should not be allowed. They have over there about 1,000 acres of land. They conduct some quite extensive farming operations, and this man is the farmer, he is the doctor, he is the business manager, he is just as much the disbursing officer to-day as he ever was. He can discharge his disbursing officer in two minutes if he wishes to do so, and he will do it, of course, whenever the fellow does not do what he wants him to do.

Now, I say the old case showed by numbers of witnesses—and I have them all collated, but I shall not take up the time of the House to read it—numberless instances of cruel and inhuman treatment. It shows numerous instances of bad and unfit food given to those people. It shows that the management is loose and careless on account of the great number of escapes. Another thing, too, this committee had superintendents of State asylums all over the country—and the record shows that Congress appropriates $220 per capita per annum; when you add to that the pension money which they get from the old soldiers incarcerated there, the per capita cost goes up to about $300 per annum. There is not another institution in America where there is anything approaching that cost per capita; and I assert, Mr. Speaker, that a proper investigation of this institution by a committee that meant to investigate, that meant to go to the bottom of it in good faith in order to relieve these people, would save this Government from $200,000 to $250,000 per annum. And then these patients would be better treated than they are to-day.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE]?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; for a question.

Mr. PAGE. The supervision of the expenditures of this institution being under the Interior Department, is not this matter within the province of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The question as to the financial end of it, I think, would be; but that is only one question.

Mr. PAGE. At the moment I interjected the question the gentleman was speaking of the financial end of the proposition and the financial affairs of the institution, and I want to say that I am in sympathy with the gentleman as to what he was saying as to the expenses and the enormous expenditure per patient.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I did not understand just what the gentleman meant by his reference to the fact that some old soldiers over there were drawing pensions and that that was counted in the cost of maintenance.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will explain that. By the way, I want to call attention to another fact just a moment. As I said in the beginning, I do not profess to know a great deal about law, but these old soldiers are sent to that institution usually from the soldiers' homes over the country. For instance, if the governor of a soldiers' home, or a subordinate of his, happens to fall out with the old fellow, if he is guilty of some infraction of some minor rule of the institution, and they want to get rid of him, he simply writes out a certificate and the soldier is committed to St. Elizabeth's Hospital for the Insane. There is no trial by jury, no trial by a court; he never has his day in court. Now, in the soldiers' home, as I understand it, the pension money goes to the individual for the benefit of the particular pensioner, but when he comes here, under what I consider to be a strained construction of the law, they take five-sixths of his pension money and cover it into the general fund of the institution. So you have the money which a beneficent Government has seen fit to give to these old soldiers going into a fund to take care of the criminal insane, the indigent insane, and other people, with whom he has no connection, thereby depriving him of some of the little comforts which the Government intended he should get out of this money.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is that five-sixths of his pay intended to pay the expenses of the soldier in the hospital?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is deducted to pay his expenses in connection with those of nearly 3,000 other people. He gets one-sixth of his pension. The other five-sixths is put into the general fund and expended for the benefit of all.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the gentleman discriminates between the criminal insane and those sent to the Government Hospital for the Insane from the soldiers' homes throughout the country? I understood the gentleman to speak specially of the criminal insane.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wish the gentleman would explain what he means when he said "criminal insane," and whether he means the criminal insane as distinguished from those who are sent to the institution from the soldiers' homes throughout the country.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. When I say "insane criminal" and "criminal insane," I use the terms interchangeably, although there is a distinction. I mean by "criminal insane" people who have been arraigned in court or indicted for a criminal offense who plead insanity and are supposed to be insane. They therefore can not be tried in a civil court on the criminal charge, and they are committed to this place because of their insanity.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then the gentleman had reference entirely to the criminal insane, and he does not mean that men were taken from the soldiers' homes under certificate of the superintendent?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no; not at all. These criminal insane come from the courts throughout the country, whereas the old soldiers come from the soldiers' homes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman says that they are sent there under certificate of the superintendents of the soldiers' homes and that the superintendents have sole and absolute authority to commit them, and that there is no other provision for sending persons in the national soldiers' homes to the Government Hospital for the Insane.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is all.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understand you to say that five-sixths of the pension money goes into the common fund?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does that apply to a man with a family?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It applies to all of them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It makes no difference whether he has a wife and family or not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; they take that money; and if any is left, then they divide it with the family.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like the gentleman to explain that.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I wish to ask a question in connection with the reply to the gentleman from South Dakota. Is it not the practice throughout the United States in the soldiers' homes to take a part of their pensions, and does not that apply to these insane soldiers when they are committed as indigent patients?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think so; but that is when a man has not got a family. When he has a family, a certain portion of it goes to his family. I am not making any assertion, though; I am simply trying to get information.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I did not hear what the gentleman from New Jersey said.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I am calling the attention of the gentleman from South Dakota to the fact that it was a common practice throughout the country to take some part of the pensions of the old soldiers when they are committed as insane patients to the Government institution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The law provides that—

> And such pension shall be by said superintendent disbursed and used under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the pensioner, and in case of a male pensioner, his wife, minor children, and dependent parents, or if a female pensioner, her minor children, if any, in the order named, and to pay his or her board and maintenance in the hospital; the remainder of such pension money, if any, to be placed to the credit of the pensioner, and to be paid to the pensioner or the guardian of the pensioner in the event of his or her discharge from the hospital; or, in the event of the death of said pensioner, while an inmate of said hospital, shall, if a female pensioner, be paid to her minor children, and in the case of a male pensioner be paid to his wife, if living; if no wife survive him, then to his minor children; in case there is no wife or minor children, then the said unexpended balance to his or her credit shall be applied to the general uses of said hospital.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Florida yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. To the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if the statute that he has just read does not apply to the pension that may be due to a soldier—that has accumulated—to the soldier who has no direct heirs, and that that sum is the money that goes into the general fund, and not the pension as it comes in regularly each quarter?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No, sir; it applies to every cent that he gets while an inmate of that institution, whether it is back pay or current pay.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to say to the gentleman that I happen to be familiar with the case of a soldier who was in one of the national sanitariums, and he had an accumulation of several hundred dollars—I think it amounted to $1,500 or $2,000—and the man had been incompetent for some time before his death, and the brother of this soldier, upon his death, attempted to get that money, and he went up against this law which the gentleman has just read. It was claimed that under that law that money went into the regular fund of that institution, and that the heirs could not get it; that the money was there to the credit of the institution, and if the soldier had lived and left the institution he might have taken it away with him.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That was not in this asylum?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It was in a national sanitarium.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am stating, Mr. Speaker, what is the fact with reference to St. Elizabeth's Asylum. It does not make any difference what the law or the theory may be. The fact is here admitted by the superintendent, and is not denied by anybody, that he takes five-sixths of every dollar from every old soldier who comes into that institution, and he puts it into the general fund.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman cite us that record that he says is in evidence?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Surely. The gentleman can get it in the document room, the testimony taken by the Olcott committee.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman a moment ago made a statement which to me is a most astounding one. I want the gentleman to put into the RECORD the statute which authorizes the governor of an old soldiers' home, by a mere certificate of his, without an examination, to send an old soldier to the insane asylum. If I understood the gentleman, it was that upon the mere certificate of the governor of an old soldiers' home——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. One of the inmates of that home could be transferred to St. Elizabeth's?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I say if the law is as the gentleman has construed it, it ought to be amended.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Because no old soldier in any home ought to be absolutely at the mercy of the governor, and be placed in an insane asylum on the governor's certificate alone.

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will yield in a moment. I do not want to be misunderstood. I say that in these soldiers' homes there is no jury trial, there is no court investigation, there is nothing except what the authorities of the home themselves see fit to make, and the old soldier is sent to St. Elizabeth's upon the certificate of the governor of the home, and that is all.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX of Ohio. I want to state this case, because I think it is in point and should become a part of the record. A few days ago an old gentleman who had been an inmate of the Hampton Home came to me and stated his case, and I made inquiry of the St. Elizabeth's institution itself and had the claims which were made to me by this man verified. The facts were these: The soldier was committed to the institution here upon the statement of the governor of the Hampton Home that he was insane. He was kept out there two or three months—I think from last February until a few weeks ago. At the expiration of this time the surgeon there certified that the soldier was not then insane, and was not insane, apparently, when he was brought into the institution. Regardless of these facts and that situation, five-sixths of his pension money was still retained by the institution, and they have declined to give it up upon my request.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I must go on, because there are several things I want to say which I have not the time to say.

In addition to this record here, which any gentleman can get and examine if he is sufficiently interested to read it, in addition to this testimony there has been testimony taken by the present Rules Committee. As I say, I filed before that committee this record, under the theory that a condition once shown to exist is presumed to continue until the contrary appears. The contrary has not appeared, and I insist that the conditions are as bad there to-day as they were at the time this testimony was taken. But, in addition to that, I filed with the committee affidavits of people, some attendants, some who had been inmates, some who were not connected with the institution at all, showing absolutely that this cruel treatment continues and that the bad food conditions continue.

Now, here is a letter written to me. I never saw the man in my life. It is written in a hand like copperplate. He uses as good language as anyone you meet. He writes an infinitely better letter than I can, and probably better than some other gentlemen of my acquaintance. I want to read what he says. The law requires this superintendent to devote all his time to that institution, and yet he admits that he is all over the country, delivering lectures here and there. If you will take this record and go through it carefully, every time, almost without exception, where it appears that some disorder took place or some one escaped or something of that kind occurred, Dr. White was absent from the institution. Now, this letter was written June 2 of this year. Listen:

In reading the daily papers I notice that the superintendent of the hospital and also the visiting committee are handling the truth very recklessly—

I will not give this man's name; he is a patient; but the committee has seen it. I do not want to get the poor devil into any more trouble than he is in now—

If I could see you or your secretary privately I think myself and a few others could tell you a few things in regard to the mismanagement of this institution. As it is, I will say this: In the past two years and four months the visiting committee has been seen in the Howard Hall building just once.

"Two years and four months." Howard Hall is where the insane criminals are kept. Now, mind you, gentlemen, before the Committee on Rules appeared members of this Board of Visitors, as they did before the Olcott committee, this eminently respectable Board of Visitors, nice old gentlemen and old ladies—I will not say "old" ladies, for they never grow old—nice old gentlemen of distinguished appearance, eminently respectable as this Board of Visitors is, and they say, "Why, everything over there is as nice as pie. It is perfectly elegant." One of them said that the management of this man was "simply marvelous." They go over there once at month, at stated periods, when everything is fixed for the occasion, and I suppose the superintendent gives them a good dinner and may be some other things—I do not know—and then they come back delighted with the institution. Here is this man, who says that during two years and four months he has been there this Board of Visitors has not been in Howard Hall building but once.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this letter from an inmate?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He was committed there as an insane man?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; and that is what these fellows say whenever you find a man in charge of insane people and anything occurs that does not look right, he smiles and says, "Oh, you know he is crazy, he is not responsible." I have had a little observation of that thing before.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Florida is reading and discussing the statement contained in this letter in which it says that the board of visitors was seen in Howard hall once in two years and four months.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For my own information I would be glad if the gentleman would inform the House as to what opportunities this man would have to give any reliable information as to the number and character of the visits made by the board of visitors.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This man is in Howard hall, and he would know if the board of visitors came there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He might or he might not. This man is a criminal inmate, is he not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; but the idea that a board of visitors, whose business it is to visit and inspect, can go into a place of that kind without this inmate seeing them is absurd. Here is an intelligent man who has not seen them but once in two years and four months. That was February 2, 1909. He further says:

Dr. White visited the same building four times.

Here is the superintendent in two years and four months visiting Howard Hall, the criminal insane ward, that he ought to visit more often than any other—visiting this Howard Hall four times in two years and four months. He gives the dates.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is that statement borne out by the testimony of anybody else?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman read that evidence?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I can not take the time; it is in this record. It is borne out by other witnesses that Dr. White visits there very irregularly, and some of them say not at all.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Just for a question, and then this is going to end it, because I must hurry.

Mr. KOPP. Does the gentleman think it is quite fair to Dr. White to criticize him in this way for not visiting this ward, based upon that letter, when it is a well-known fact by all those who have examined the question that many of the criminal insane are kept in the cells a great part of the time, and usually they are the class who are clever enough to write a letter of that kind?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Do I think it is fair to do what?

Mr. KOPP. To criticize Dr. White, basing the criticism upon a letter from an inmate who may be one of the vicious insane and confined to his cell?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, of course; if a man is unfortunately crazy on some subject, they have a right to treat him as they please, and he ought not to complain, and his word is not worth anything. The poor devil is there under the charge of a crime, we will say; and I want to say that better men than this record shows Dr. White to be have been charged with crime.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have not the time now, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry; but I want to finish. The letter continues:

> February 2 he came with the committee. There were three individuals besides himself. February 21, 1910, August 25, 1910, he came to ward 5, when we were about to go in to their so-called dinner, solely to see Willard, the man who shot Beck; and March 20, 1911, he passed through two wards. What his object was I failed to find out.
> Hoping that these few lines will reach you, for I am sending them over the doctor's head, and he came very nearly placing me in my grave about six months ago for trying to reach Congress; and I would write more, but there is a fear within my heart that it may miscarry. Will you be so kind as to please ask Representative ———, from my district, if he received a letter from me asking him to call here? Will you please be kind enough to let me know if you receive this letter, and what Mr. ——— said? Please forgive me for trespassing on your time—

And so forth.

Mr. Speaker, of course that is worth nothing, and none of the testimony of any of these inmates is worth anything, when put against the testimony of a man charged here with permitting occurrences at that institution which, if they are true, are worse than a crime.

Mr. Speaker, I assert that no man, I do not care what he is convicted of, I do not care what crime he commits—no jailbird, no convict with stripes on him—is half so mean, is half so low, is half so contemptible as is the man who will mistreat helpless, insane people in his care and keeping. [Applause.] There are numbers of other such letters here. Here is one that I will not read, because the language in it I would not care to read, but it tells of conditions that are simply fearful, repulsive, shocking to the sense of decency of any man. That thing and those things are allowed over there. Mr. Speaker, you will come nearer getting the truth, as a general rule, from children, fools, and crazy people than you will from your sleek, interested, designing gentlemen. How can you ever make proof unless you use this class of people? I assert that the record taken here before the old committee and before this committee showed that this Board of Visitors were absolutely incompetent to speak upon this subject. They had not been there enough; they had not had the opportunity to know the facts with reference to this management.

I will tell another thing that this record shows, and there is no evidence that that has ceased, either. There is a firm of lawyers in the city of Washington who are employed by Dr. White, and I will tell you what the court record shows in one case, and I am informed that there are plenty of others just like it. Some old soldier was put in there and he had $226 of back pension money due him. The superintendent wanted it in the hospital, of course, so he gets one of these lawyers to file a petition in his name, praying for the appointment of a committee in lunacy to take charge of the poor devil's estate. The other lawyer partner is appointed the committee in lunacy. The attorney who filed the petition got $25, the committee in lunacy got $25, two of the doctors of the institution got $10 apiece in addition to their salaries, and, with the court costs and other charges, it cost that poor devil eighty-odd dollars to collect the $226 due him by a beneficent Government; and that sort of thing continues to this day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, personally, I care nothing about this. It is true I have some constituents in there, and I have letters from their relatives, but I am interested in this question, and I am interested upon the broad lines of humanity, but I want to say to you, and I want to say to this House, how can we go home, you particularly who represent large constituencies of these soldiers, how can you go home to your people with the record staring you and them in the face showing that these people are systematically robbed of their little pittance, that they are forced to associate with the lowest class of criminals who go to that institution? Why, the superintendent says that none of the insane criminals are intermingled with the others; but I examined him, and upon cross-examination I made him admit that a certain physician, I will not call any names, indicted in the courts of Washington for the heinous crime of infanticide, plead insanity, was sent to St. Elizabeth's, and at the time this testimony was taken, he was not only an inmate of Maple ward, where the officers of the Army and Navy are kept, but he was absolutely on the pay roll of the institution drawing a salary every month. There is the record. That man—it makes no difference if he was a professional man and an educated man—is just as much a criminal as the vilest, lowest, meanest, sneak thief in that institution. [Applause.] Ah, Mr. Speaker, I say that you can talk about saving dollars for the people, you can talk about the probing of this department and the other, here is one that ought to appeal to the conscience of every man of this House who has a heart in him. This man is an absolute monarch over there, and these old soldiers who are sent there from all over this country are treated as I have told you the record here shows they are treated. Now, as I said a moment ago, I do not happen to come from a section where many of this class of people who are incarcerated here come from, but, Mr. Speaker, I am an American citizen. That flag is mine, and I always cheerfully vote to pay a pension to the old soldiers of my country. [Applause.]

And, as I said to a gentleman last night, I will vote for the enactment of any pension bill that my friends from the North bring in here and say their people want. [Applause.] But here are these people. They have spent their lives in the service of their country, spent it upon a pittance. God knows they get nothing for active service; and in their old days, when the sun of life is sinking beyond the hills and these old soldiers, crippled, wounded, and tottering on to the grave, bereft of reason, God help them when they fall into that institution with this record under the sworn testimony in the case. Is that the treatment that a just Government ought to accord to those people? I am appealing to you people who come from among them. Gentlemen talk on that side about the old soldier. Now, I am not making this talk for any votes that may come to me. There are not enough, although we have got quite considerable and they are growing more numerous with us every year, but there are not enough in my district to seriously affect me, if I do not get them. Thank God, I do get them, and they are my friends and I am theirs, but you people who may be dependent upon that vote for your seats in this House, I ask you, Do you think that is just and righteous treatment to be accorded them? Oh, I see some gentlemen smile who live in that section, but they get those votes. Mr. Speaker, my conduct in this House and my vote in this House shall never be measured solely upon the line of saving dollars to the people. I shall vote at all times, so far as I am able, guided and directed by my conscience as to what is right. This record shows that this is wrong. I know that some members of the committee have been there and looked the ground over at the instance and invitation of the superintendent. I do not object to that; it is a good thing to do——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have only about five minutes remaining.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Will the gentleman mention the names of this committee who have been invited there by the superintendent?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. So I understand——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. If the gentleman understands it, then mention the names of those who have been invited there by the——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not animadverting upon them for going—I understand the gentleman did——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Do you mean to say I was invited by the superintendent?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not; no. I do not know whether you were or not. And it is perfectly immaterial.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. But you made the statement that they had been invited to visit by the superintendent of the institution?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would not confine myself strictly to that statement.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I think you ought not to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I say not, and I am not animadverting upon the gentleman or anybody else for going, but I say that the superintendent and others said that you could not investigate under three days, and that, in my judgment, would be a cursory investigation. I am not censuring the gentleman or anybody else for going there. They ought to go. Every Member of this House should go, and go at a time when not expected to be there.

Now, I say, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. NYE. Just one question.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. NYE. Did the Olcott committee draw any conclusions from the testimony and make any recommendation?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; they made quite a number of recommendations. A majority of the committee as a whole approved of the situation there. But still they recommended certain changes, and so on. The minority of the committee did not approve of it, and they pointed out some other things which they said were wrong, and so on. But——

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit just one question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I yield for just a question.

Mr. KOPP. Other than the charge of misappropriation of pension money, which is clearly before the House, will the gentleman state in a few words just what the injustices are that are being suffered by the old soldiers—that he thinks should be investigated?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have been trying to do so. I certainly have been very unfortunate if I have not made myself understood on that point. I have not a very extensive vocabulary——

Mr. KOPP. I ask in all sincerity. I understood the gentleman's charges in a general way were against the institution. The last part of his plea was for the old soldiers, as though they were suffering some special injustice. Now, what is that injustice?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will state that. I say that they are taking his pension money. I say the record shows he does not get sufficient food. The record shows his clothing is not sufficient. The record shows that he is made to associate with criminal insane, which is wrong——

Mr. KOPP. One more question. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he was ever out at that institution and saw the old soldiers?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No, sir.

Mr. KOPP. I will say for his information that I have been all through it, and not at anyone's invitation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I can not yield for the gentleman to make a speech, as I have only two minutes left.

Mr. KOPP. Just a second. It is immaculately clean——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] declines to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say this, and then I am going to close. I have not been there. I am not testifying before this House of my personal knowledge. I am taking the record as it is here. I am taking the sworn testimony of the witnesses before the Olcott committee and this committee. That is what I am arguing this case from. And I will say to the gentleman that I have nothing personal in this matter against Dr. White, or Dr. Black, or anybody else; but I do say that the record in this case shows that it is an outrageous condition of affairs over there, and one that ought not to be tolerated by a Government such as ours. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the criminal insane ought not to mingle with the innocent insane. I say that this pension money ought not to be taken from these people, and I say the food and clothing ought to be of a better character when he is getting about $300 per capita each year to take care of them. Now, Mr. Speaker, just one word more.

I have been investigating this matter for five years. I have gone into the records. I have talked with witnesses; I have heard them testify; and I know from their statements what the conditions are, and not from my own knowledge. I have made my fight. And I ask permission, Mr. Speaker, to put in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, such parts of the testimony as will be appropriate to the statement I have made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if he proposes to insert anything that has been printed in the hearings?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I hope, Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen will not interrupt.

Mr. MANN. This interruption will not be taken out of the gentleman's time. The gentleman from Florida requested leave to insert some papers in connection with his remarks?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes. They are affidavits and papers that have been presented and letters that have been sent to me.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I regret that I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida that he be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I simply want to state this, and I crave the indulgence of the House for a second or two. I have made a fight to get this investigation. I have made it from the humanitarian standpoint. I have made the fight, and I have shown the committee that it would cost only $500. I do not believe it would cost even that much to do it. But I have put this record here so that the House would know and the country would know about these conditions that prevail in sight of this House and in sight of this Capitol of the Nation. [Applause.]

I submit the following letters as a part of my remarks:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, one Mr. Kelly, the subscriber to this affidavit, who, being duly sworn, says:

That he was employed as an attendant at the Government Hospital for the insane for about two months during the spring of 1910; that Dr. William A. White was then, as he is now, superintendent of said asylum; that affiant as such attendant was employed in P ward, where about 45 patients were kept, there being two attendants on duty for this number during the daytime and one at night; that some of the patients in P ward were easily excited and dangerous, and that at times some of the patients who became unruly required the use of great force by the attendants in subduing said patients, which was due to the insufficient number of attendants.

That dangerous patients have opportunity to get and use dangerous weapons, such as salt bottles, knives, and forks; that there is no special separation of the classes of cases at meal time; potatoes served with jackets on, and many patients eat them that way. That excited cases placed in side or closed rooms have no arrangement for their toilet or for drinking water; that the meat actually smells from its rotten state when served on the table of the patients and the attendants, and that butterine for bread is not a part of the daily menu; the coffee is poor, and no sugar is served to patients, as affiant has given sugar from the attendants' table to some of the unfortunates. That the clothes served patients are generally misfits and are not seasonable, the same suit often used throughout the year. Frequently the linen for patients and beds would run short; not sufficient help at the table to wait on patients, and frequently not sufficient food served for the needs of the patients. Never saw Dr. White in hospital ward but once; walked hurriedly through and spoke to several patients only. Never saw a minister or priest in the hospital ward, although many were extremely ill, and quite a number died while I was there.

The hours of work for the attendants are from 6 a. m. to 8 p. m., with one half day off each week and one night each week until 12 p. m. And that affiant has knowledge of other facts which will tend to show mismanagement of said institution, and upon an investigation he could and would go into greater detail relative to the facts herein stated.

That affiant further states that he was not discharged from said institution, but left on his own accord because of the conditions existing there.

WM. R. KELLY.

Subscribed and sworn to this 12th day of June, 1911.

ANACOSTIA, June 12, 1911.

I desire to state that I was an attendant at the Government Hospital for the Insane for the past seven years—resigned on June 3, 1911.

That during my seven years of service I have seen many patients go away from the table hungry because there was not sufficient food for them to eat.

The clothing of the inmates was ill-fitting, poor material, not warm enough during the winter.

No sugar put on the tables of the inmates under my care; eggs not more than twice each month.

Frequently the meat had a bad odor, and most always underdone.

I have known of patients from Howard Hall (criminal insane) to be in the wards with the innocent insane. I have had working under me on general work in institution's grounds patients of the innocent insane working side by side with the criminal insane patients from Howard Hall. In one case was that of a young boy, a military patient, worked in the same gang with the criminal insane. These same gangs of patients would eat and sleep in the same ward.

No inducement was given or held out to them for working. Have known them to go over a week without any allowance of tobacco.

Never saw Dr. William A. White in the dining room of my patients for over two years; prior to that time only about three or four times in seven years.

The patients received the same weight of underclothing winter and summer (cheap cotton material). Common, coarse, heavy shoes, brogans, and I have had considerable trouble to get a supply of shoes when patients needed them badly.

Never saw the patients under my care, in West Lodge, ever get milk.

The buildings were poorly guarded by insecure gratings, easy to escape if patients so desired. Not enough help to wait on the tables; food poorly prepared; seen greens served with sticks in it.

After the newspaper publications as to escapes the authorities put on additional attendants. Not sufficient on duty to prevent harsh treatment of patients and escapes.

West Lodge No. 3 was very cold last winter day and night.

Last winter no rubber boots allowed to patients under me, and, consequently, it was a common thing for the patients to be returned with their feet soaking wet. No changes at hand to dry them.

Butterine is not served at every meal.

Towel would serve for many patients, some of whom would be suffering from eruptions on the skin.

Constant complaint among my patients that they did not get enough to eat, clothes not warm in the winter, poor food, etc. I left the institution because of the poor food (compelled to eat two-thirds of my meals outside), poor wages, and bad conditions existing at the institution.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 2, 1911.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In reference to the proposed investigation of the administration of St. Elizabeth's Hospital by a committee of the House, I beg to state that I have visited there for 18 years past in the interest of my son, one of the patients, and have had some opportunity of judging of conditions in the ward on the main floor of building R, in which the so-called sick patients are confined.

This ward, I am informed, has a capacity for 50 patients and is nearly always full, yet there is only one water-closet and one bathtub (in a separate room). Obviously this has no tendency to promote cleanliness. In the dormitory in which my son is confined (a wing of the apartment just described) are 14 cots, one directly opposite another, by the side of the entrance to the closet. To obey the calls of nature in summer or winter these invalids must walk barefoot over bare floors, with bare backs exposed through shirts slit from neck to tail. They may obviate this by resorting to the dirty habit of using one of the commodes screened off for their accommodation, to be emptied no one knows when, so that the patients who have no physical ailment are exposed to contamination from the feces of those who have, no less than from the respiration of so great a crowd in so small a space.

These patients, too, are of all ages—from early manhood, through middle life, to old age—so that the natural tendency is for the older to sap the vitality of the younger. Such is nature's law.

My son went into the hospital with a perfect set of teeth. A few years ago we discovered that all the teeth on one side of the upper jaw had been drawn, while all the other teeth were left intact. It is easier to draw than to treat. His was an alleged case of mental imbecility, and it was declared would be progressive. But we have not been able to detect any deterioration in the 18 years of his confinement, except that he has lost the power of speech.

These conditions seem to illustrate the importance of establishing a training school for the mentally defective in this hospital. Many might in time acquire the ability of self-support instead of drifting into indifference and utter helplessness where they become a perpetual charge upon the community.

When the laundered clothing and bedding are delivered, they are dumped in a pile upon the floor, and the attendants lay hold with great energy and, in attempting to distribute them, throw them over the bare floors instead of providing suitable receptacles for them. The game seems to afford them rare sport. The Board of Visitors may be so called in derision, because they never visit.

Very respectfully,

R. T. MORSELL,
1518 P Street NW.

P. S.—Many of these patients are kept in bed continually when they ought to be out getting the air. But it saves attendance to keep them on their backs and perhaps hasten their dissolution.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1911.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Responsive to your suggestion that I should write a few words in explanation of my letter to my client, Mr. David R. Watson, dated April 24, 1911, and filed with the Committee on Rules by the Secretary of the Interior, I will state as follows:

On the 11th day of June, 1910, Mr. Watson had a hearing in the supreme court of the District in a habeas corpus proceeding. Drs. Glasscock and Franz and Attendants Thompson, Barrie, and Burch testified against Mr. Watson, while he was the only witness in his own behalf, the physician upon whom I was relying being at the time absent from the city.

The testimony was taken stenographically, and I inclose it herewith in typewriting for your examination.

As a summary of the testimony, which was the basis of my letter to Mr. Watson, I will simply state that the hospital physicians admitted under cross-examination that Mr. Watson was temperate, intelligent, had a good memory, was not dangerous; that he did not get into altercations with other patients unless provoked by them; that he was permitted to go to the city unattended frequently during his entire term of confinement; and that his only so-called "epileptiform convulsions" consisted of not over three occurrences during his 10 years' confinement, resembling a nightmare, happening at night, and occupying only a few minutes, and in one instance only a half minute, according to the testimony of the attendants who observed them, the doctors who testified never having done so. The only "insane delusions" testified to was Mr. Watson's belief that he had been persecuted by Mr. Burch and that Dr. Franz was attempting to hypnotize him. The testimony disclosed the fact that Dr. Franz is a professional hypnotist, whose business it is to hypnotize the patients at St. Elizabeth's, though he testified that he had not attempted to hypnotize Mr. Watson. It further appeared that some years ago, when Mr. Watson, by permission of the District authorities, had set up a small business in Washington for the sale of canes and patriotic songs of his own manufacture and composition to Grand Army men, he had been interfered with by Mr. Burch, who summarily locked him up because he came in late, as he had a right to do by the terms of his pass, and keeping him locked up for several days, thus destroying his business. Mr. Burch, though denying Mr. Watson's statement, admitted under cross-examination that Watson had established a business and that he was confined and prevented from going to the city about the time as charged by Mr. Watson, but that he did so upon the order of the physician in charge, which Mr. Watson denied and stated he was released by that physician as soon as he became aware that he (Watson) was so confined. It is clear that these were not insane delusions, as there were facts upon which his suspicions were based.

It is further intimated in this case that Mr. Watson believed in spiritualism, but there was no proof on that point whatever, and even if he did so believe it would be no evidence of insanity.

The foregoing summary, therefore, shows that the signed statement made by Dr. White to Representative MCKINLEY, forwarded by the secretary to the Committee on Rules in this connection, was neither warranted nor justified by the facts set out in the sworn testimony of the hospital witnesses.

And I will further say that the letters sent to Mr. Watson's daughter and sister by Dr. White have been equally exaggerated and misleading, and calculated to dissuade them from assisting in Mr. Watson's release from the hospital. I would further state that Mr. Watson is not the spendthrift described in Dr. White's letter, but on the contrary has saved up a large part of the enormous income of $2.50 per month (allowed to him out of his $15 per month pension), which is supposed to be spent in the purchase of newspapers, postage, tobacco, etc., not furnished by the hospital to the old soldiers.

I expected that the letter I wrote to Mr. Watson would be opened by the hospital authorities, and am much pleased to see Dr. White's statement over his own signature that my letter marked "professional and confidential," and sent through the United States mail, was opened by Dr. White before delivery to Mr. Watson, if delivered at all. If it had reached Mr. Watson and he had copied and returned to me the draft of the letter which I inclosed to him, I should have presented that to the Committee on Rules with an explanation of his case, had the time been afforded me.

Notwithstanding that Mr. Watson was unsupported by other testimony at the trial, the jury were out several hours before returning their verdict against him. I was unable to prosecute an appeal in this case, for the reasons set out in my letter to Mr. Watson, printed in the record of the hearing.

I think it well to state that some time before writing the letter to Mr. Watson, I received information to the effect that he had been again locked up on a closed ward for defending himself against the assault of a patient who had previously assaulted a very infirm old soldier, in whose behalf Mr. Watson had interfered. I wrote to him for particulars, but presume my letter never reached him, as I received no reply.

Kindly return the inclosed testimony, as I desire to bring it to the attention of Mr. MCKINLEY, in Mr. Watson's behalf, in refutation of the statements made in Dr. White's letter to him.

Very respectfully,

RICHARD P. EVANS.

I also append hereto a synopsis of the rules of the Interior Department providing for the distribution of pension money by the Superintendent of St. Elizabeth's, promulgated by Secretary Ballinger, May 1, 1909, under the acts of February 20, 1905, and February 2, 1909:

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to yield to the gentleman from Texas to make a statement. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield it out of his time?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes; out of my time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I had thought that the Committee on Rules has enough trouble without the gentleman from Florida turning loose the 3,000 inmates of St. Elizabeth's Asylum against that unfortunate body. [Laughter.] Since the gentleman has inaugurated his fight for an investigation of the Government Hospital for the Insane we have had a flood of affidavits and letters from the inmates of the institution, and they are still coming. The gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, besides making a careful statement in regard to the asylum, will also be able to answer the legal arguments made by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Florida complained that we had given the superintendent of the asylum and other officials of that institution an opportunity to be heard, and said that we had not followed that policy in the other investigations which have been reported to the House. Let me remind the gentleman that when we passed the resolutions to investigate the Sugar Trust, the Steel Trust, and the affairs of the government of the District of Columbia, we invited those interested on both sides of the controversy to come before the Committee on Rules, and we gave them the fullest opportunity to be heard.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; for a question.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman said he gave them notice. I would like to ask what sort of notice he gave them?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Through the press and otherwise.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. "Otherwise." How otherwise?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, in conversing with those we thought interested in the matter.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh!

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules will be perfectly able to take care of itself in this controversy. Let me say to the House that when the gentleman from Florida introduced his resolution, and it was referred to the Committee on Rules, he was given ample opportunity to be heard. He brought his witnesses—some good witnesses, some discharged employees, and others—to whose statements we did not think we should give the fullest credence.

After the gentleman had fully presented his side of the controversy, Dr. George Lloyd Magruder, of the city of Washington, who stands at the head of the medical profession here, asked, in behalf of the superintendent of the asylum and of the Board of Visitors, that they might be heard, and those gentlemen were invited by the Committee on Rules to present their side. They came. Dr. Magruder made his statement, and also Gen. Torney, the Surgeon General of the United States Army, a member of the Board of Visitors.

Then Mrs. Gen. Sharpe, a member of the board of visitors, addressed the committee in a satisfactory way, and afterwards Mr. Scott C. Bone, a newspaper man of high standing in the District of Columbia, testified, and others gave testimony. And let me assure both sides of the House that after the hearing had been full in every respect, as complete as any gentleman on either side desired, the Committee on Rules did not think the gentleman from Florida had made as strong a case as he alleges here, but did think that those on the other side of the controversy, the board of visitors, composed of eminent persons, had made a good impression. So we have not reported the gentleman's resolution for an investigation. If he has any additional testimony to offer before the Committee on Rules, the case is still open. He can come there and we will be glad to hear him.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Did I not tell the Committee on Rules that if you gentlemen would go into the merits and hear it, I would bring all the witnesses and let you gentlemen pass upon it?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; and we notified you to bring on your additional witnesses and they would be heard at any time. The Committee on Rules did not agree with the gentleman from Florida that he had made a good case, and therefore his resolution has not been reported.

The Committee on Rules have nothing to cover up on behalf of the Government institution or any other institution in the country. They are willing to have investigations made where they are important and necessary; but we have not come to the conclusion that any good would come from this particular investigation, and therefore have not reported it favorably.

Let me say to the House that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], a member of the Committee on Rules, has visited the asylum and made a careful investigation. He is a gentleman of high standing and will make a statement to the House on behalf of the committee, and I think you will be satisfied when he has finished.

I have no particular objection to the adoption of the resolution which the gentleman offers here this morning, but it seems needless. It is a resolution of inquiry and privileged. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] has had the opportunity to lay his views before the House and the country. As far as the Committee on Rules are concerned, we are satisfied to let the case rest when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has made his statement on their behalf.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I hope that I may be understood as standing for the rights of humanity, and standing for that unfortunate class of people who are confined in an asylum such as that which the Government has here in the District. I would not want my friend from Florida for one minute to think that I would stand upon the floor of the House of Representatives of the American Congress and defend wrongdoing to those poor unfortunate people who are over there in St. Elizabeth's.

I do not deny, and no one who is connected with that institution or any other institution in this land will deny, that there are at times abuses which creep into a great institution like that. We have them in Illinois, we have them in New York, we have them in Massachusetts, and other States of this Union.

The institution on the hill over across the river contains now nearly 3,000 patients gathered together from all parts of this land. It is a great institution, and I am glad to stand here this morning and offer my voice in defense of the great work that that institution is doing for those unfortunate people. [Applause.]

As was said by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], that institution was organized for the purpose of caring for the insane of the Army more than 50 years ago. I think Dorothy Dix was the one who came to this Congress and secured the appropriation for the large building that was first placed upon that ground.

It went on and on until finally the institution was enlarged, and then they began to take in the insane from the District of Columbia, and then those who came from the soldiers' homes of the country.

Then there came a time when all the insane criminals of the United States were placed over there in the building called Howard Hall.

It is probably within the recollection of some of you here to-day, and I am sure it is with the ex-Speaker of this House [Mr. CANNON], who will call to mind a number of years ago when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House, that he visited this institution and personally saw the needs of certain buildings, and, I believe, through his influence there were built some of the most modern and best buildings there are used to-day for the treatment of the insane of the country.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that there are buildings and conditions there that ought to be remedied, and I submit to this House that there is no man that could be placed in that institution who could, in my judgment, do a better work with the buildings that are now there than Dr. White and the board of directors of that institution.

I want to talk to you a minute about the board of directors connected with that institution. We find on that board are such men as Dr. George Torney, Surgeon General of the Army; the Surgeon General of the Navy; the Surgeon General of the Marine-Hospital Service; they are all members of that board for the reason that enlisted men of the Army and Navy and of the Marine-Hospital Service are confined in that institution, and so the law wisely provided that these men should be members of the board of directors.

There are certain members appointed to the Board of Visitors, as stated by the gentleman from Florida in his attack on the management of this institution.

I want to read to you a minute a little of the testimony that came before the Rules Committee in reference to the visitations of these men and women to that institution.

Dr. Magruder, who is known to the people of Washington as a great physician, said:

> I go out there every three months anyhow. During the summer my tour comes two months in succession, and I go to the stated meetings and to the annual meetings. I suppose I go to the institution six or eight times a year.

Then I find that Surg. Gen. Torney said:

> I have inspected this hospital on several occasions. I visited all the buildings, all the wards, the dining room, kitchen, Howard Hall, where the criminal insane are kept, and the Administration Building. I have inspected the records of the hospital and read the reports, and I have inquired into the requirements of the institution and its needs of reorganization. I wish to say that I do not know an institution that is better administered and shows greater efficiency in its results than the Government Hospital for the Insane. Whether it is due to the system instituted by Dr. White or his predecessors, I do not know; but as an institution, it is admirable in every respect.

I want to call attention to the testimony of Scott C. Bone.

The question was asked him how often he visited the hospital. He said every quarter. The chairman asked him if he made extra visits. He said he made a number of extra visits; that he was at the institution last week; that the meeting of the board of regular visitors comes quarterly.

Mrs. Sharp, the wife of Gen. Sharp, is also a member of the board of directors. She says in her testimony that she visited this institution upon the regular meetings, and also that she goes there whenever she is in the city at least every two weeks.

So, when the statement is made on the floor of the House, or anyone makes it before the Committee on Rules, or elsewhere, that these people do not visit the institution and look after it as they should, being members of the board of directors, it is not borne out by the facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this matter came up before the Committee on Rules I felt it my duty to visit that institution, and, without invitation from the superintendent, without any notice to the superintendent that I was to be there—although intimated that such was the case by the gentleman from Florida in his remarks—I went over there and spent two days in going over the institution from one end of it to the other. I went into every building there; I went through the kitchens, the dining rooms, and everywhere that it was possible for me to go on these visits.

At the last visit I invited the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP] to accompany me, and we went over the institution, as much as we could on that day. We visited Howard Hall, went through the different apartments, went from the bottom to the top, viewing the patients and the condition of the buildings and rooms, as they were at the time; and I want to say to this House that in all the visits that I have made to that institution wherever I went I found nothing wrong in the way of uncleanliness and good discipline and good order.

I also went among those patients who are of the worst character that possibly could be found in an institution—a class of patients who are unable to care for themselves in almost any particular—and I want to say that no man, I care not who he may be or where he comes from, can visit that institution and visit those departments who will not come away feeling thankful to the medical profession, and feel that those in charge of that institution have taken advantage of the latest improved way of caring for these patients; and there you will find people who have been confined to their beds for years, and not among them all will you find one afflicted with bed sores, which every physician knows are so apt to be found in that class of people. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] talked about the food—that the food is vile and unfit to eat. I went through the kitchen, and I saw the food that was being prepared for those people, and I want to say to the gentleman from Florida that that food was wholesome—that that food was good. I examined it, and those with me examined it. When the gentleman comes before this House charging that, I want to say that it is evident he has never visited that institution and has never seen the kind of food that is served to the inmates out there. The gentleman from Florida brought in a witness, a Dr. Kelly, along with Mr. Evans, who is one of these pettifogging attorneys here in the city of Washington, a man who is trying to live upon these unfortunate people, getting what little money they have in a fee that he can get out of them for a writ of habeas corpus, and he is mad about that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. No; I can not yield now.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just wanted to ask him a question.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman later on. This man, Dr. Kelly, was an honest young man, coming from the State of Kentucky. He was a good young man, and they brought him in there because he had resigned and was going to quit the institution. Why? Because he had made application to be promoted, and he had failed in his examination to get this promotion, so he came before our committee to tell his tale of woe. Outside he said, "Yes; that institution ought to be investigated; that it is the worst institution in the world." And yet when he came before the committee, what do you suppose he said? Why, one of his complaints was that Dr. White would not let the male attendants and the female attendants run together very much.

Another complaint was that the food was bad, and then he was asked in what particular instance the food was bad. He said one night in Howard Hall they brought in some beans that were so hard you could not crack them with your teeth. Then he was asked if that was reported to Dr. White, and he said it was reported to Dr. Glick, who was the assistant. He was then asked what was done, and he said that Dr. White went after them, and things were better after that, showing that whenever those things were called to the attention of Dr. White he immediately took steps to remedy the condition and make it better. [Applause.] I give it to you on my reputation, if it is worth anything in this House, that the food in that institution is not bad, and is wholesome, and is good enough for anybody to eat. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just want to ask the gentleman a question or two. Did not Dr. Kelly flatly contradict Dr. White with reference to the night of the escape, by saying that there was only one attendant on the ward that night?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes; I think he did.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, one other question. The gentleman speaks of Mr. Evans as a pettifogging lawyer, who was trying to live on habeas-corpus suits. I know that he wants to be fair. And does it not appear that Mr. Evans has lived here since 1865, that he is a Mason in good standing, that he is a member of the Methodist Church, a Knight of Pythias, and a member of the bar here in good standing?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Well, that is probably so, but I want to remind my friend from Florida of an incident that I once heard a friend of mine relate. He lived in the same county. His father was a good man and he owned a large farm out in Illinois. His word was good at any time for what he wanted to buy, and the son said to me, "One time I went to Olney [where I live now] and I went out to a mill to buy some feed, and after I had loaded it on the wagon I went to pay for it and found that I had spent more money [as a young man might do], and I had not sufficient to pay for the load. I said to the miller, 'I have not sufficient money to pay for the feed; I do not have it here; you know me; you know my father; you know who he is.' 'Yes,' he said, 'that is true; I know your father; he is a good man'; but he said, 'I want to tell you some good men have mighty bad sons.'" [Laughter and applause.] And so I would want more recommendation than the gentleman from Florida offers upon this floor in defense of his old-time investigator and agitator, Mr. Evans, who writes to patients in that institution, marking the letters "personal and confidential," and then invites them to "copy these letters" and also give him the names of other patients in that institution who might want to get out on writs of habeas corpus that he may also make terms with them and make a little fee out of them for himself. [Applause.] I am not a lawyer——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me a question? I was about to say I believe the gentleman is a reputable physician. In the gentleman's opinion, would a physician or a lawyer be better qualified to judge the merits of the management of an insane hospital?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Well, I would think that if you are looking for a person to take charge of an insane asylum or to look over the inmates of that institution and the conditions existing there you would most certainly employ a physician. I have great respect for the legal profession. It has done a noble work in this country for the rights and liberties of men, but I want to say to you whatever its ability it is not in the practice of medicine.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I do.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to inquire if it is not a fact that all institutions with large numbers of people congregated therein must not prescribe a plain diet, although a wholesome and substantial diet, in order to preserve the health of the inmates of the institution?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Certainly; that is understood by all medical men, that the patient would have prescribed for him a certain diet, according to his needs; and I know from my own investigation of that institution and the data that is given on this subject over there and my talk with Dr. White in reference to the kind of diet he gives these people and how he varies it, and I am sure he has placed that institution upon a scientific basis, measuring, as he does, the kind of food and amount of food for each person, by which I know he has solved the great problem of economical feeding and, in feeding those patients, the kind and quantity of food they require and best adapted to their condition.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I do.

Mr. KOPP. A large percentage of the patients are confined to their beds, are they not?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Quite a number of them.

Mr. KOPP. I would like to ask the gentleman to give us his opinion, as a physician, as to the treatment those who are helpless receive as compared with that received in any first-class hospital.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. A few moments ago I said that the treatment was as good as any institution in this country. I say you can find no institution in the world where that class are better cared for than over there on the hill.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to qualify neither as a lawyer nor as a physician, but just as a matter of plain common sense. I am ready to concede, for the sake of the argument, because I do not wish to go into that question, as the doctor well knows, as to the treatment these patients receive, whether they are sufficiently fed or sufficiently clothed or properly cared for; but there is a matter that, I believe, received the serious consideration of this House and about which the very eminent and learned alienist who is now addressing us is qualified to speak——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I am not an alienist; I am just——

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman is everything that the medical profession requires.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois (continuing). I am just a plain doctor.

Mr. STANLEY. Now, it developed in that testimony that there is no adequate means of retaining any man in this institution who wants to get out of it. And if he is retained he is kept within a brick court. He is held a prisoner. Now, great numbers of the insane have, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] well knows, a homicidal mania, and whether they be paranoiacs or whether they be epileptics, or whether they be men suffering from dementia præcox or other mental diseases, they often develop the false idea that they may save society or punish their own wrongs by taking the life of somebody else. There are hundreds of such people in St. Elizabeth's. There is no one of them, as I understand, who either can not get out, or, if prevented from escaping, is held as a prisoner. A man with a homicidal mania is no more to blame for it than the man who believes he is the Apostle Paul or the King of England. He should have exercise in the open air, be allowed to work in the fields under proper guidance. Now, whether they be strictly paranoiacs, or whether they be men with a homicidal mania, they usually assume that they are wronged by some man high in authority. It is their tendency to slay Presidents, Speakers of the House, Judges of the Supreme Court, and the like. We have had a number of instances of homicides committed by paranoiacs.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I hope that suggestion will have nothing to do with our Speaker of the House now. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLEY. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman, and I am making this inquiry in all seriousness, if he regards it as safe or practicable to keep criminal insane in an institution of that kind, within a few hundred yards of the city of Washington, with facilities for escape at hand?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Answer, yes or no. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Go ahead.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, partly in answer to the gentleman——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I wish the gentleman would not take my time just now. I thought he simply wanted to ask a question.

I want to say to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] I do not desire to engage in the field of the different kinds of lunacy, and I want to say this to him, that while I believe it would be better to remove that institution farther from the city of Washington, I want you to remember this, the Presidents who have been assassinated in this country have not been assassinated by escaped convicts or by those who have escaped from lunatic asylums.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for just a minute?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. For just a question, I will.

Mr. STANLEY. Were not two, if not three, of the Presidents of the United States assassinated by men whom you would qualify as distinct types of paranoiacs?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would not say as to that, but it is likely so. What I am saying is that these men were not men who escaped from any insane asylum, nor were they convicted of insanity before any court or tribunal in this country.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Just a question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to ask the gentleman if it has occurred to him that if this distinguished pettifogger he has referred to is interested in the soldier inmates getting large pensions he is interested in getting control of the money?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I can not answer the gentleman. That may be so, but I have not found it out.

But I want to say a few words, because my good friend from Florida [Mr. CLARK] has exercised such great interest in the old soldiers of our country, and I compliment him for standing upon this floor and eulogizing them, because I have no doubt that he means every word that he says. But I want to say that in that institution there are old soldiers and sailors who are sick and afflicted in many ways; some have only one arm, or one leg, and one especially I noticed there who had no limbs at all below the knees. And the pathetic thing that struck me when I came into the corridor where that old soldier was confined was that he got down from the chair in which he was sitting and stood on his stubs of legs and saluted as only a trained soldier knows how to salute. And I will tell you, my friends, when you go there and see the fine way in which those men are cared for it can not help but touch you and make you feel that these men in the declining years of their lives, who are unfortunately insane and must be confined in an institution—you can not help but feel that, thank God, we have a place where they are so well cared for as they are in that great institution across the river. No man in this House will fight harder or longer to right any wrong done one of these defenders of our country, and I would not for one moment see one of them mistreated in the least.

I found none of those old soldiers and sailors in Howard Hall. But I want to be perfectly frank and fair with this House and say that there is some little in what the gentleman from Florida says, because occasionally there comes to that institution one of those old soldiers or sailors who has criminal ideas and homicidal ideas in his head, who does things that he ought not to do; and that man ought not to be housed with these innocent, good men located in the other parts of that institution. There occasionally comes a time when a man of that kind is confined in Howard Hall. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I just wanted to ask what Howard Hall is.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Howard Hall is the place where the criminal insane are kept. Those who come from Leavenworth and Atlanta penitentiaries are confined there.

Mr. BUCHANAN. They are kept separate from the others?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes; they are kept separate from the others—those that are insane. They are confined in a building quite a distance from the others.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not want to be offensive, and I am not trying to be facetious, but I would like to know which side of the resolution the gentleman is on. [Laughter.] The chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. HENRY] said he had no objection to the passage of this resolution of inquiry. Does the gentleman from Illinois take that stand?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the gentleman from New Jersey reminded me of that. I want to say to this House that I believe it is our duty to vote down this resolution. Let that institution over there rest and do not keep on stirring up matters here and making bad the discipline of that institution. Vote down that resolution. Let the institution alone, and I am sure the men who have charge of it, if there are any abuses that do arise, will correct them, just as such abuses would be corrected in any other institution in all this land.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. In just a minute. I want to say this, Mr. Speaker, in reference to what my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], who has more than ordinary knowledge of this subject, said in regard to the insane people confined in institutions of that kind. You should not get the idea that they are all wild and violent and have to be restrained. Some of them, as suggested by the gentleman, are as cunning and smart as they can be, and when an agitation of this sort is going on, when an investigation of this kind is being proposed and debated in Congress and in the newspapers of this city, you can not avoid having bad discipline in that institution among that class of patients; and then when a man like our old pettifogging lawyer, Evans, is continually stirring up strife and creating trouble for that institution, I believe this Congress ought to set its foot down upon this thing now and let that institution alone.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This resolution is simply asking the Secretary of the Interior to furnish to the House whatever information he has. Is the gentleman opposed to the passage of that resolution seeking this information?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Oh, I know, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Florida, who says that for five long years, with his old friend Evans, he has attempted to investigate this institution, and each time he has met with defeat. Now, as a last resort, as a final triumph, when he might be able to get hold of something that would enable him to come back to Congress again, he goes to the Committee on Rules and comes to this House and asks you that an investigation be had. He now takes the little innocent—as he thinks—resolution, and wants to have some information from the Interior Department.

Why, bless your soul, the committee appointed on the Expenditures in the Interior Department can get all that information any time they want it. Now, let us put our foot down upon this sort of agitation. Let us stand by these men who are doing this noble work.

In conclusion I want to say just one word about pensions. It has been attempted to be shown that the pension money of these old soldiers is taken from them and put into the treasury of the institution. I would have you know that this is partially true, and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is mistaken as to the other part.

A portion of the money of these old soldiers is retained to buy certain articles for their special comfort. I think it is one-fifth or one-sixth of it that is retained and spent to buy little extra things for them. A portion of it goes to the wife, if there is one, or if not, to children under 16 years of age. If there be a dependent father or mother, it goes to them. All these accounts are audited down here in the office of the Auditor for the Interior Department, and I want to say to my friend from Florida [Mr. CLARK] that if he has any old soldier in that institution from his district, if he will write to Dr. White he can get a statement of what is done with the pension of that soldier, and verify the statement through the Treasury Department. I did that and found that those accounts were all right, and there was nothing at all but what ought to have been done in the case of this soldier that I speak of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want it to be understood that I stand for the old soldier as much as my friend from Florida does, and I do not want him to feel that he stands here in this House alone to champion the rights of the old soldiers in that institution. I want to be counted with the friends of the old soldier, and I believe that if the gentleman from Florida will visit that institution, look it over, and see the place out there, which in the press of the country has been denominated the "bull pen," he will find there a beautiful park of 7 acres where these ex soldiers and sailors are permitted to exercise and enjoy themselves the best that it is possible for men of that kind to do. What has been said about that is one of the misrepresentations of that institution.

So, I say, let us determine to put an end to this agitation. Let us put a stop to the efforts of the men on the outside of this institution who want to make a living out of these unfortunate people. I do not refer to any Member of Congress when I say that. Let us declare ourselves against that as we ought to do, and let us declare ourselves in favor of the proper management of that institution. Then, I am sure that when you go and look that institution over, if you will, you will find things that ought to be corrected, and you will come back here feeling that Congress has not done as much as it ought to do in the way of affording proper quarters, and so forth, for that great institution.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, prior to two months ago, if I had been asked to name the superintendent of St. Elizabeth's, I could not have done so. Prior to the day when I went out there with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] I had never seen the man. We were not invited to come there. No human being other than ourselves knew that we were going, but, in the face of the serious charges filed by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], we decided to go out there, and we investigated the institution as well as we could.

Now, I do not pretend to qualify as a physician or as an alienist, but I do claim that I can tell when an institution is clean, when the food is good, and when everybody seems to be as well satisfied as they could be under the circumstances.

We went through ward after ward. The floors were immaculately clean, the beds had the cleanest kind of linen. We asked 50 employees, if we asked one, whether there was vermin of any kind or description about the premises, and everyone told us there was not. We went into the kitchen. No one knew we were coming. We went there just at dinner time. We inspected the food. We saw them eating in their dining room, and I want to corroborate the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that it was just as good food and as well cooked and as wholesome as anybody could ask for.

Now, it does seem to me that this resolution ought not to pass; not because two or three of us have been there to inspect the place, but because a prima facie case has not been made out by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KOPP. In one moment. Everybody knows that the most difficult kind of an institution, eleemosynary or charitable, in all the world is an insane asylum; that a peculiar kind of discipline is needed there that is not needed anywhere else, and that when there is agitation of this kind, exciting otherwise unbalanced minds, it is very difficult indeed for the superintendent and those associated with him to carry on their work. So unless there is at least a prima facie case made, it seems to me we are not being fair to the men whom we have placed in charge of that great institution to order this investigation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just want to say that the pending resolution is simply requiring the Secretary of the Interior to furnish certain information.

Mr. KOPP. I realize that, but the pending resolution is something to keep this agitation boiling, and it will afford the means of another step forward in this investigation, which we do not want. The gentleman criticizes Dr. White because he has been around the country lecturing. Dr. White is not only one of the greatest alienists in this community, but he is one of the greatest in the world, and are you going to say to him, because he goes to meetings of scientific men to lecture to them and gives them the benefit of his great knowledge and experience, that he ought not to do it? When we were over there there was another great alienist from Toronto to investigate and get suggestions from this institution because it is recognized, as he said, throughout the world as one of the greatest, one of the most advanced in the treatment of insane patients that there is. Now you criticize him because he is attempting to alleviate those affected with this misfortune all over the world.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the testimony before the Committee on Rules showed that Dr. White made a trip every year to Europe to study the problems he had to deal with, and when he came back to the institution he always put in operation a lot of new things he had learned while abroad.

Mr. KOPP. Dr. White has visited institutions all over the country and all over Europe and other parts of the world to get information, and I think the testimony of my colleague, Dr. FOSTER, shows that he has used it to good advantage. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would not be fair to the management of that institution to precipitate an investigation when there is nothing to be gained thereby.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Florida made a most astounding statement in regard to the money received by soldiers who are inmates of the Government Hospital for the Insane. He made the statement that five-sixths of the amount received went into the general fund for the maintenance of the institution. Now, I think he is entirely mistaken, and I believe the gentleman does not want to have in the RECORD a misstatement. I call his attention to the hearings before the special committee of investigation of the Government Hospital for the Insane in May and December of 1906. I read from volume 2, page 1217. Mr. Evans testified as follows:

Mr. HAY. There is one thing I would like to ask you. I inquired of Dr. White about it, and I have not got it clear in my mind. In the case of a man drawing a pension before the act of February 20, 1905, do I understand that all of it goes into the hospital?

Mr. EVANS. Every dollar, whether it was $6 a month of $100 a month; every dollar went into the fund of the hospital for general purposes and not for the special benefit of this man, and all the money is retained there. There is a big fund now in the Treasury of the United States where the parties have died.

Mr. HAY. And it is used there?

Mr. EVANS. It is used there for general purposes. They could use it on the streets, on the roads, and for painting fences, etc.

Mr. HAY. You say it is retained in the Treasury?

Mr. EVANS. Quite an amount that had not been expended is put to the credit of the hospital in the Treasury account. I have seen some statements here about that. Since the passage of the act of February 20, 1905, the pension money is cut up. It is cut up on the basis of about a sixth. For instance, take a pension of $8 a month, stating the figures approximately: About $1.34 of that is set aside for any little needs or wants of the soldier. About $3.33 is set aside for a fund to be turned over to him in case of his discharge, and $3.33 a month is retained for his care and maintenance in the hospital. In the event that he has dependent relatives and others from the outside, there is some provision made, I believe, that a part shall go to them in the small pensions.

Then, on page 1385, Dr. White, in testifying, said, in the event of death or discharge of a pensioner who has such relatives, then the money is paid, if he has not recovered, to his guardian, or if he has, to him or to those dependent relatives. If he dies and there are no such beneficiaries, under the pension act the money goes to the general purposes of the hospital.

He says a certain portion of it goes for board and maintenance. It goes to the wife, dependent parents, and minor children in the order named, and we pay out every quarter to all the pensioners who have dependent relatives the pro rata portion of the pension which is due them. It is done every quarter. When the pension money comes in immediately there is issued checks to these relatives.

There is no doubt but that the gentleman from Florida is very much mistaken in his statement that five-sixths of this amount is used for the maintenance of the institution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me there?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will put in the RECORD testimony showing that that is absolutely the fact, that they do get five-sixths.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What does the gentleman say as to this record that I have read?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I did not hear all that the gentleman had read.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am certain that the gentleman is mistaken, because I had a case where I had occasion to look the matter up.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is it, and the gentleman will find that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And the law which the gentleman read, which is the act of February, 1905, applies to this institution as well as to the soldiers' homes throughout the country.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; and I stated that the construction was a strained one; but under that they did take five-sixths of it, and I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the gentleman from Florida and of the House, I will state exactly how pensions are disposed of belonging to soldiers in this particular institution, and I make this statement after having made an inquiry to ascertain in regard to it.

When the soldier has a pension of $12 per month, the wife gets $10, and $2 is set aside for his benefit. If he gets $15, the wife would get $10, he would get $2.50 and the institution $2.50. If he gets $20, one-half goes to his wife, one-third to himself, and the balance is retained by the institution. This rule as to proportion prevails up to $55 per month. If the pension is $72 per month, the wife gets $36, he gets $12, the institution $18.33, and the balance goes to his credit. If he is discharged from the hospital, he is paid the amount to his credit. If he is taken out by a guardian, the guardian receives it. If he is returned to some soldiers' home, the amount due him is turned over to the treasurer of the home. If he dies and has a wife, she receives what is due him, but if he has no wife, then it goes to the institution.

According to the testimony taken before the committee, to which I have already referred, out of a total of about $100,000 annually received by the Government Hospital on account of pensions, the institution only received about $20,000, or one-fifth of the whole amount, and this included moneys that went to the institution because the soldiers had no wives.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for 10 minutes before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. HAY. But the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If I can withhold the demand——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not withhold it after it has been ordered.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Those opposed will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-nine Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey) there were—ayes 46, noes 71.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, were the yeas and nays refused on the demand of the gentleman from Florida?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not finished the count when the gentleman from Florida withdrew his demand for the yeas and nays and made the point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman did not withdraw it. The Chair had counted, but failed to announce the result of his count.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had counted the affirmative, but he had not counted the negative; in fact, the negative had not been called for, and the gentleman from Florida rose in his place and made the point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The other side was not demanded.

Mr. MANN. The Chair was counting on the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair counted those standing in the affirmative, on the call for the yeas and nays, without announcing whether there was a sufficient number. The other side was not demanded, and I think that the Chair should announce that there was not a sufficient number, and that the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The situation was this: The yeas and nays were demanded, and the Chair counted those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays. The Chair then asked those who were opposed to ordering the yeas and nays to rise in order to ascertain whether a sufficient number had voted for the yeas and nays, because that is the only way you can ascertain it when there has not been a vote. Before the Chair announced the count of the other side, the gentleman from Florida made the point of no quorum. The Chair then counted the House, and announced that there was not a quorum present, and the rule automatically makes a call of the House under the circumstances.

Mr. CARTER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER. What are we voting on?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state that when the roll was called those in favor of adopting this resolution will vote "aye," and those opposed will vote "no."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, let us have the resolution read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees; the question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Florida, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 124, answered "present" 10, not voting 174, as follows:

YEAS—79.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in printing certain letters which I was given consent to put in the RECORD, I would ask unanimous consent of the House to leave out the names of the writers of the letters.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear.

The SPEAKER. The point of order of the gentleman from Illinois is well taken. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] will state his request.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will state that the House gave me unanimous consent to print certain letters in my remarks. The persons writing those letters, or some of them at least, are averse to having their names known, and I want to ask unanimous consent to print the letters without the names. And one thing further. Reference is made to a Representative in Congress in the letter which I read, and I want to leave his name out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that in printing these letters, when extending his remarks in the RECORD, he may leave off the names of the persons who wrote them and also leave out the name of the Member of Congress referred to.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is it the idea of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] that it will be a good thing to print what will substantially appear as anonymous letters containing statements concerning this institution, located right here, and which letters will undoubtedly be read by the inmates and employees of that institution and will undoubtedly excite them?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I can print the names on some of them. They do not make any request that I shall not do so. Now, in the letter that I read, for instance, the writer especially asks that his name be not used.

Mr. MANN. The letter the gentleman read goes into the RECORD as part of his remarks. Now, the gentleman himself, I think, very properly——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I see the point the gentleman makes, and I will not publish those, with the exception of the one I read, without the names. But I do want to leave out the name of the Representative.

Mr. MANN. Nobody objects to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to report favorably House resolution 208, introduced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON]. It is a privileged resolution, covering an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the desk. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SWEET] calls up the following resolution by authority of the Committee on Military Affairs, which the Clerk will read, together with the report.

House resolution 208.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all records, reports, letters, or papers of any description which, on June 14, 1911, were in or recorded in any bureau or office of the War Department, or were in the custody of any civil or military officer or employee in any bureau or office of the War Department, and which relate in any way to charges or accusations of criminal or other misconduct on the part of any officer or officers of the Pay Department of the Army since January 1, 1905, or which relate in any way to absence from duty since January 1, 1905, of any such officer or officers against whom such charges or accusations have been made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution. I would like to know if there is any way of getting a copy of it?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman can get a copy of it in the document room.

Mr. MANN. Just at present it would not do me any good to go there and get a copy of it. I am afraid it would be passed before I could do so. The gentleman bringing up resolutions ought to have copies on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report (No. 51).

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution 208, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I will yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON], who is more familiar with the matter than I am.

Mr. COVINGTON. I think in three or four minutes I can satisfy the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in regard to the purport of this resolution. It simply calls upon the Secretary of War to transmit to the House copies of records and letters and papers relating to any charges of criminal misconduct or accusations of that character made against any officers of the Pay Corps of the Army since January 1, 1905. And I desire to state very frankly that it is intended to cover simply a period which will refer to a particular case that information has been obtained upon, and which is sufficiently accurate to warrant such transmission of records. It calls for no documents other than those ordinary papers relating to the charges against officials of the Pay Corps within that period. If there are none in the department, none will be transmitted. As a matter of fact, it simply asks the transmittal promptly of such documents as affect charges made against pay officers in the Army within that period, for the purpose of giving the House the present condition of the Pay Corps.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COVINGTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If there should be any charges of misconduct on the part of any officer in the Pay Department, whether founded or unfounded, though it might be desirable not to make those charges public in the interest both of the service and of good government, possibly the prosecution of the officer, possibly in his interest, under this resolution those charges would have to be published to the world.

Does the gentleman desire to have that done and make that a rule, that if charges are ever presented against any official of the Army or the Navy, thereupon Congress shall direct that those charges be made public by printing in the House proceedings or as a House document?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will say to the gentleman that when any charges are made against any officer in any department of this Government, which are of a criminal character, the good of the service is always subserved by the publicity of those charges. If the man be innocent, the very unsubstantial nature of the charges constitutes his best defense before the American people. On the other hand, the preservation of secrecy in those charges may oftentimes lead to abuses, even in the best administered of administrative departments. I can see no reason why charges of a criminal nature should not under all circumstances be given publicity. If those charged with crime in the civil walks of life have indictments against them, although they subsequently may have acquittals at the bar of justice, nevertheless, my good friend the gentleman from Illinois knows that publicity comes to them. Acquittal is their justification, and certainly no injury can be done a man simply because he happens to be in the military branch of the service, by the publication of charges of criminality which have been lodged against him.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if there is any Member of Congress who has never been charged with wrongdoing or misdoing, he is a strange Member of Congress.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. He is a new Member. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. He is not worth much. Now, the question is whether, if such charges are made, we are to publish them with the sanction of the House in all cases. I can readily understand, and I think everybody here can understand, that there might be charges or evidence in the War Department which it is not advisable or desirable to make public; either, on the one side, in the interest of the Government, or, on the other side, in the interest of the person. I have no doubt that many false charges are made, but this would require that all papers which relate to any kind of charges shall be sent to Congress, and, automatically, they will be published as House documents.

Mr. COVINGTON. I apprehend that certainly within the short period of six years the pay corps of the Army of the United States has not degenerated to such an extent that the transmission of charges of criminal misconduct against its officers would constitute a very voluminous document. If it is so, then it is time that some radical reorganization should take place in that corps.

Mr. MANN. This does not have to be criminal misconduct at all. But, even if it were, a resolution of this sort becomes a precedent for action. As far as we are informed, there is no more reason for making this request about the pay corps than there is about every other official of the Government. You might as well introduce a resolution requiring that all heads of departments should transmit to Congress all charges, and all papers or documents relating thereto, against any official of the Government in that department, and have them published by the House as a House document. If the gentleman has something on his mind, if he knows of information that he desires to obtain, why does he not prepare a resolution asking for information on that subject? If he has nothing——

Mr. COVINGTON. I will state frankly to the gentleman that I have or I certainly would not prepare a resolution of this sort.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I simply want to ask the gentleman from Illinois in the time of the gentleman from Maryland if this resolution is comprehensive enough to get such information, if it exists?

The gentleman says, "If he knows of any instance or has heard of any instance, why does he not specifically ask for them?" That was substantially the question, was it not?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois if the resolution is not sufficiently comprehensive to cover the information?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; I think it is. Under this resolution we would get a copy of every charge made by anybody at any time in the last six years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution merely refers to papers in any way related to any charges or accusations of a criminal nature against any officers in the Pay Corps of the Army since 1905. There are not many instances of that, I think, as the gentleman from Maryland has said. There are very few, I fancy; and if such papers exist, I doubt if the War Department would be put to any serious inconvenience in finding and transmitting such documents.

Mr. MANN. Let me suggest—because I fear the gentleman has not as carefully examined the resolution as he usually examines resolutions—that the resolution provides for the transmission of—copies of all records, reports, letters, or papers of any description—

That relate to any charges of criminal or other misconduct, and so forth, or that—relate in any way to absence from duty since January 1, 1905—

And so forth. Every order permitting a man to be furloughed under this would have to be sent back to the House. Every excuse that has been given, although it might be good and it might not be desirable that it should be made public, would have to be sent back to the House and published under this resolution. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] think that would be a good thing to adopt, as here proposed, with reference to all the officials of the Army?

Mr. COVINGTON. If the gentleman from Texas will permit me, I will say to the gentleman that this resolution applies only to leaves of absence. If he will notice the language, he will see that it is limited to those in the service who have been guilty of criminal misconduct, and it will not require the production of the furloughs of officers of the Army in general.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman is mistaken. Any absence without leave—in that respect I probably was mistaken—is misconduct; and then the resolution requires all papers in relation to any absence to be published, whatever the excuse may have been, no matter whether the excuse may have been found good by the War Department. Possibly this will not affect anything in the Pay Department, but a similar resolution, if this one is passed for the Pay Department, should be passed for any other department of the Government if the gentleman presents a resolution like this.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield first, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask if it is the purpose to require the War Department to send papers to Congress in these cases where charges have been preferred and the officer has been court-martialed and dismissed from the service?

Mr. COVINGTON. No; certainly not.

Mr. WEEKS. Would not the resolution cover such cases as that? And if that is true, would not that comprehend a large amount of documents and testimony?

Mr. COVINGTON. I take it that an officer who has been court-martialed and dismissed is no longer an officer in the service.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference. It would cover that.

Mr. WEEKS. It did not seem to me, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COVINGTON. The resolution restricts it to officers who are in the service at the present time——

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It says: "Since January 1, 1905——

Mr. COVINGTON. Against whom accusation has been made.

Mr. WEEKS. A criminal accusation would be made, and the man would be court-martialed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The resolution says:

Charges or accusations of criminal or other misconduct on the part of any officer or officers of the Pay Department of the Army since January 1, 1905, or which relate in any way to absence from duty since January 1, 1905, of any such officer or officers against whom such charges or accusations have been made.

Does the gentleman mean by that an accusation of absence without leave?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Suppose a man had been absent and sick, and was able to explain it satisfactorily. Does the gentleman want to get a full record of that?

Mr. COVINGTON. No. It refers only to officers against whom charges of other character have been made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman's resolution is not specific in that respect.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I have no desire——

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will state that I have no desire to cause a dragnet to be thrown out to bring to the House all sorts of charges affecting the War Department. I have no desire to cast a stigma on the Army of the United States or any of its departments. I take it the War Department will use due discrimination as to what in its judgment comes within the purview of the resolution.

Mr. WEEKS. I think if the gentleman from Maryland will read the resolution he will find that any charges of misconduct preferred against any officer was when he was an officer of the Army. These are preferred when they are officers in the Army. As the gentleman from Nebraska suggested, there may be hundreds of pages of testimony taken in the case of an officer where he has been dismissed. When the charges were made he was an officer in the Army, and under this resolution I submit that it would be necessary to furnish copies of those papers.

Mr. COVINGTON. I do not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman, in the beginning of the resolution, calls for copies of all records, reports, letters, or papers of any description which, on June 14, 1911, were in or recorded in any bureau or office of the War Department, or were in the custody of any civil or military officer or employee. I want to submit to the gentleman if he does not think those words, "or in the custody of any civil or military officer or employee," should be stricken out. That is pretty broad—in the custody of a clerk or messenger, it may be.

Mr. COVINGTON. It relates to the charges.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely, but that calls for something more than that which is of record. What is custody? I suppose an employee had a letter in his pocket——

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, I take it not.

Mr. CANNON. After all, what is the necessity of those words?

Mr. COVINGTON. The legal construction of the words I think the gentleman from Illinois will recognize as meaning simply those papers which are either in the actual physical custody of the War Department in the sense that they are in the files, or those papers in the physical custody of the employee. The gentleman recognizes that many documents are recorded and many others are not. Letters are filed or are letterpress copies. In all departments there are papers merely filed in pigeonholes; many others are only in the physical custody.

Mr. CANNON. After all, if they are on file they are a part of the record. It seems to me that those words would lead to confusion.

Mr. COVINGTON. I have no objection to modifying the language so that it shall cover only charges of criminal misconduct against those officers now in the Pay Department of the Army, in order to meet the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing to restrict it within such limits as will bring the real information to this House that it ought in reason to have.

Mr. CANNON. What is the objection, if the gentleman is advised, if this resolution is made to cover the alleged misconduct of any one officer, to calling directly for the information which is desired?

Mr. COVINGTON. I will state frankly that I had a reason that I do not at this time want to disclose why it is not advisable to call directly for the information. But I am perfectly willing that this language shall be made to cover only those officers of that particular department now in the actual service, as suggested by my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. COVINGTON. I do.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts made the exact point that I wanted to make, but I want to ask the gentleman from Maryland if he would be willing to strike out the words "other misconduct"? I suggest that for the reason—I do not know what offense the gentleman is aiming at—but if a paymaster of the most exemplary character, unblemished record, should have five or six years ago become intoxicated, never before or since, it would require the publication of that fact to the world. It would be purely useless for any purpose and harmful only for every purpose. Criminal misconduct involves, of course, something that is worth while to investigate.

Mr. COVINGTON. I will state very frankly to the gentleman that I recognize that difficulty. I do appreciate just what the gentleman from Illinois has stated, that there might possibly be transmitted information that would not amount to such misconduct as to subject the officer to dismissal, but, on the other hand, there is, as the gentleman well knows, a difference between that grave misconduct which would subject an officer to court-martial and misconduct which would subject him to punishment in the criminal courts of the country.

So that there is that infirmity of the English language which makes it difficult to reach precisely the cases that are wanted to be reached. I realize that difficulty, I must confess. Gentlemen will realize that there are acts of a grave nature that officers of the Army may be guilty of, but which no criminal court could punish them for.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that he can defeat and obviate all that difficulty by putting in the resolution the particular thing which he wants to reach or wants to have disclosed. That is, some particular officer or some particular offense or some particular transaction, it seems to me, ought to be named in the resolution.

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, if the gentleman from Nebraska had heard my statement to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]——

Mr. NORRIS. I heard the statement.

Mr. COVINGTON. I stated that I would not do that, but I would accept the amendment the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] very wisely suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the gentleman disclose to the committee the evidence he has?

Mr. COVINGTON. The gentleman did disclose to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. So that the committee understood the nature of the accusation?

Mr. COVINGTON. Absolutely. I disclosed to the Committee on Military Affairs, and stated to them——

Mr. NORRIS. Would the disclosure or the proper identification of the official or the offense in the resolution meet the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. COVINGTON. I am not sure about that.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that would be the only excuse, the only reason, why it should not be done, because the gentleman must admit that——

Mr. COVINGTON. I am not sure whether it would or not.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman must admit that in making this kind of a charge to the people who must pass upon it he should offer some definite matter.

Mr. COVINGTON. I will assume the responsibility for stating that when that resolution gets to the chief of the Pay Department of the Army he will be able to transmit with sufficient accuracy the information that is wanted, when it is limited as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. I have never before in my brief experience—at least I can not call it to recollection now—known of an instance where the House has passed a resolution that was reported simply on the statement of a Member that he does not want to disclose the real object and purpose of the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COVINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Your inquiry is limited to accusations of a criminal nature.

Mr. COVINGTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. No; it is not limited to that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then you follow that with the vague expression, "Or other misconduct." What do you mean by "other misconduct?" What do you want to inquire into?

Mr. COVINGTON. I just stated to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that in the military service there may be serious derelictions of duty, derelictions of duty which, if the War Department had not recognized them, should subject it to criticism.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Surely.

Mr. COVINGTON. Now, those derelictions of duty may be of a serious character, but they may be not such as would warrant punishment in the criminal courts of the land.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Are they of such importance that a vast record ought to be brought from the War Department from 1905 for investigation?

Mr. COVINGTON. How many instances does the gentleman suppose in the Pay Corps of the Army there have been in the last six years where records of moral shortcomings, even if you put the language that broad, have taken place? I hope not more than one or two.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman would include in "other misconduct," the mere fact that an officer had been absent, we will say.

Mr. COVINGTON. It does not say so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The resolution, at its conclusion, says:

And which relates in any way to charges or accusations of criminal or other misconduct on the part of any officer or officers, etc.

Mr. COVINGTON. It only provides for those instances where the officers have been guilty of misconduct and have also been treated most courteously and considerately by being given long leaves of absence. It refers only to those officers.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield again? I would like to suggest to the gentleman that if he has fear that the publication at the present time of the information that he bases his belief on that this resolution ought to pass is of such a nature that it would defeat the purposes of the resolution, that the House should perhaps go into executive session and——

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, I would not ask that.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman, on the other hand, ought not, it seems to me, expect the House to pass a resolution here to establish a precedent of taking official action on a statement where the person who gives the information refuses to disclose what is the object of the resolution or its purpose. Now, if it were just a simple thing, if the gentleman will permit me for a moment, if it were just one item, one person, one offense, or one year or one month, it would be a different proposition, but this covers six years, and the words "other misconduct," it seems to me, would bring here, if the resolution were complied with literally, every complaint, every reprimand or correction that was ever made in the Pay Department of the Army for the last six years against any person or any officer or any official.

I do not know how many there would be, but does not the gentleman think something of that kind occurs daily—some little correction that nobody cares anything about? This resolution, if it were complied with, would bring that all in here, and we are to do all that without having any evidence disclosed here, either on the floor or from the report of the committee, that there has been any misconduct of any person. It seems to me it is asking us to do more than the gentleman ought to expect us to do; besides it would be a dangerous precedent.

Mr. COVINGTON. Well, I will simply say to the gentleman that we vote a great many times in this House on faith. Mr. Speaker, I have made all the explanation I care to make about this, and I shall now state that I will accept the addition of the proviso attached to the resolution suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. It reads:

Provided, That this resolution shall only apply to those persons who are at the present time commissioned officers in the Army.

The SPEAKER. That would have to be put in the shape of an amendment. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SWEET] has the floor.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if the gentleman from Michigan will yield a few minutes to me?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. SWEET. Five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. That will be ample.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan when this resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. SWEET. This morning.

Mr. KAHN. Was there a meeting of this committee this morning?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I received no notice whatever of that meeting.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I will state that the committee was called by the chairman and notices were issued, and a very special effort was made to get the gentleman from California, who was phoned at his office at least three times.

Mr. KAHN. I was not at my office, and my mail is sent to my hotel the first thing in the morning. There was no notice of this meeting in my mail.

Mr. HAY. Well, I do not suppose the gentleman means to say that no notice of this meeting was given.

Mr. KAHN. No; I do not. I simply say that notice of this meeting has not reached me. We have had no meeting of the committee for several days, and therefore when I did not receive a notice of the meeting I did not know the meeting was to be had. But there is no desire on my part at any time to oppose a resolution for a proper inquiry. I have no desire to shield or protect any officer charged with any criminal offense. This resolution, as has been stated several times on this side, is exceedingly broad. It is a sort of a dragnet resolution to take in everything and everybody. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] is rather disingenuous. He says that things should not be covered up; if men have charges brought against them, even though those charges be proved false, they should not be put away in the files of the War Department and allowed to stay there.

He thinks the country has a right to know something about the charges. Now, the gentleman ought to be equally frank with this House. He ought not to cover up anything. He ought to say frankly to the House that there is such and such a charge pending against such and such an officer, and that he wants the papers in that case, and then we would procure the papers for him. But to go out in the broad way contemplated by the resolution and try to bring out charges that may have amounted to nothing and have them spread before the country seems to me entirely improper, and I hope the resolution, on that account, will not pass.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SWEET] yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at the attitude taken by the gentlemen on the other side. Resolutions of this character have been passed time and time again in this House, and if there are any charges against any officer of the Pay Department of a criminal nature or any misconduct of so grave a character that it merits the investigation of this House, what objection is there to this resolution, calling upon the Secretary of War for information? Why this anxiety to defeat a very ordinary and customary resolution?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. During my 14 years of service in the House I have never seen a resolution of inquiry offered which was so broad as this one, I think. Does the gentleman recall any?

Mr. HAY. I do not know that I can point out any specific resolution that has been offered during my time of service here, but I do know that resolutions of inquiry as broad as this are and have been constantly before this House, and have been passed by the House. This is not such a broad resolution. How many officers are in the Pay Department of the War Department? Not over 100. And there is no doubt about the fact that if this resolution is passed no man is going to be injured by it who ought not to be injured. I venture to say that there is not an officer in the Pay Department who would be opposed to the passage of this resolution on the ground that there might be some charges pending in the War Department against him. If charges are pending against him, what objection is there to the country knowing what charges are pending? When has it become the rule that these charges, if such there be, are to be buried in the pigeonholes of the War Department? If charges are of such a character as to call for a court martial, those charges are made public; and if some man, through the favoritism of high officials in this Government, has been able to escape justice, has been guilty of crime and misconduct, is it for this House to cover that up?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky). Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman what objection can there possibly be to putting into this resolution—like, I think, is the universal custom—the specific, particular case you want to get the evidence on?

Mr. HAY. Can the gentleman specify any resolution where that has been done?

Mr. NORRIS. I never knew a resolution where it has not been done.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman specify a resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not recall now, but if the gentleman will cite me to a case of any resolution of inquiry, that will be an instance of it. I do not believe there has been an exception in all the time I have been here.

Mr. HAY. I do not believe there has been any resolution of this character where the individual has been named; and if the gentleman can cite me such a resolution, I would be glad if he would do it.

Mr. NORRIS. You can get every resolution of inquiry that ever was passed, and you will get an illustration in every one of them.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman another question. Does not the gentleman think that the words "or other misconduct" will include even a reprimand or disagreement between officials as to whether some official had done something that technically was wrong? I am not objecting to getting the information, but it seems to me it involves almost an infinite amount of work, and unnecessary work on unnecessary subjects.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman seems to think that the officers of the Pay Department are constantly guilty of misconduct, and that there are large and numerous records in the Pay Department showing that. It is not the case at all. The officers of the Pay Department, like the officers of the Army generally, as a class, are not guilty of misconduct.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that is true; but this covers six years, and with the words "other misconduct," if an official has done anything—it does not make any difference what—to some other official that was not right, or that was even claimed to be wrong, it would be included in this resolution. I take it the gentleman does not want to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HAY. Nor does the resolution assume anything of the kind.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the use, then, of including these words, "other misconduct"?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia is extended two minutes.

Mr. HAY. I simply wanted to say, in answer to the gentleman from Nebraska, that this resolution does not contemplate that there shall be returned to the House the records of every officer in the Pay Department as to whom there may be some suggestion that he has been guilty of negligence or something of that kind.

It contemplates misconduct, and "misconduct" is no uncertain word. It has a clear and distinct meaning, and it seems to me very strange that gentlemen on the other side should undertake to oppose this resolution.

What objection can there be to having the criminal action and the misconduct of officers of the Pay Department or any other department shown to this House and to the country? I hope the resolution will pass; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts insists upon his amendment—which I do not think helps it at all, because when the resolution says "officers of the Pay Department" it means, of course, those who are now in the Pay Department—but if he desires to have that amendment adopted, I hope the gentleman from Michigan in charge of the resolution will accept the amendment, and that we can now have a vote.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, perhaps enough has already been said on this question, but I want simply to remark that although I can not approach this subject, and did not in the committee approach it, from the standpoint of long experience in this body as a Representative in this House, I felt that the resolution was in the direction of obtaining for this body information which we are entitled to have and which the people want us to have.

It does not seem to me that the resolution is open to the objections suggested. When the House under that resolution makes its demand on the War Department, I doubt if there will be any tendency on the part of the War Department to extend the language of the resolution so as to make it come down, as the gentlemen seem to fear, to matters of trivial consequence. On the other hand, if there is any straining of the language used in this resolution, it is more likely to be in the opposite direction.

I feel that the people of the country, from the investigations that have already been made, are in a temper where they would prefer to have every department, especially where accusations are suggested, investigated by this body, and I feel that the resolution which has been offered here by the gentleman from Maryland is one that all the Members, regardless of politics, ought to vote for, and one that every honest officer in the Army ought to be glad to have considered.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Virginia asked for one reason why this should be denied. I have one. It may not be important, but it was stated that there were a hundred men in the Pay Corps of the War Department. I do not know any of them. This resolution covers a period of six years. It is a charge against one man or a hundred men; I do not know which. Perhaps the majority of the Members of this House do not know. If an order like this be made, it will stand for an indefinite time as an implied charge against every man in that corps, because it does not fix the period of time in which this demand may be made. This will go to the public, and the public will understand that it means this paymaster or any one of 99 others in that department, and so it seems to me that it ought to be limited and a straightforward statement should be made as to whom it is directed against. If there are papers there against any man, let us know it and let the public know it, in order that direct action may be taken and no implied charge of dishonesty may stand for an indefinite time against a large majority of that department, upon whom this resolution, if passed, will cast a shadow for an indefinite time.

Your resolution does not say within what time this may be transmitted, and the public will wait for an indefinite time to find out who are the men who have charges against them and who have not. It amounts to an aspersion against more than one—against practically everyone in that whole department of the service.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SWEET. For a question?

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield for a statement of about two minutes?

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, this resolution seems to me to have developed the kind of situation which led to the adoption by the House of that rule which resulted in the appointment of the several standing committees on the investigations of the different departments of the Government. The Committee on Expenditures in the War Department has jurisdiction——

Mr. SWEET. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this involves no expenditure whatever.

Mr. HELM. This committee is not limited only to expenditures in that department, but, among other subjects, to the proper application of public moneys by officers in the Army—the accountability of officers in the Army; so that it seems to me that, instead of passing this resolution in its present form, if anyone possesses any information touching the misconduct of any officer in the Army, and it appears that this resolution touches more immediately upon the Pay Department of the Army, this committee, which is now actively at work, is the proper committee to deal with this matter instead of putting out this dragnet, as it has been deemed proper to term it. And I desire to say that it is not my purpose in rising to shield or defend any man, but more for the purpose of directing the attention of the House to the fact that the proper committee to handle such matter is the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, which has been vested with the authority to perform just such work as this resolution calls for.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman I should like to say that the committees to which he refers have been appointed for the purpose of investigating the expenditure of moneys appropriated by this body for the support of the various departments. Now, if, as a result of accusations of a criminal character, it should appear that some officer in the pay department had been guilty of that kind of misconduct relating to money, the committees investigating expenditures in the various departments would not have jurisdiction of that. Therefore the Committee on Military Affairs, after giving the matter full consideration, and after sending out the proper notices, in an effort to get a full attendance, have unanimously reported in favor of the adoption of this resolution. We believe it will result in good.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, the committee, which the gentleman says gave this matter full consideration, had in mind some one particular case, did it not? The matter was explained to the committee, as I understand it.

Mr. SWEET. It was not necessarily limited to one case.

Mr. NORRIS. Was there more than one?

Mr. SWEET. It was not necessarily limited to one case.

Mr. NORRIS. Was there evidence before the committee of misconduct applying generally to this department of the service?

Mr. SWEET. We have reason to believe that it embraces more than one case.

Mr. NORRIS. Was there any reason why, under the evidence given before the committee, a resolution could not be so drawn as to apply to the particular cases concerning which information is desired?

Mr. SWEET. We so considered; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Then why was the resolution drawn in this form?

Mr. SWEET. I now demand the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan demands the previous question.

The question being taken, the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the resolution——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Is there not an amendment?

Mr. SWEET. It has not been offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. WEEKS. I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] said he would offer it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. He said he was willing to offer it, but it has not been offered.

Mr. SWEET. It was not offered at the proper time, and it is too late to offer it.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] may be considered as pending and as coming under the order for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts may be considered as having been offered in time and now considered.

Mr. NORRIS. Reserving the right to object to that, I want to ask the gentleman whether he would be willing to allow 5 or 10 minutes' debate on that amendment?

Mr. HAY. I would not.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 55, noes 29.

So the resolution was agreed to.

NATIONAL BUDGET.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to print in the RECORD some remarks made by me at a meeting of the Accountants of America, held recently in Washington, on the subject of a National Budget. I do not feel like taking the time of the House to deliver here these remarks, but I would like to have them brought to the attention of the membership of the House.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object, although I think perhaps I ought to and require the gentleman to deliver them in the House, because I think it would be of value to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"Mr. SHERLEY: Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I once said that in the House of Representatives a little law went further than in any other place on earth, and, being a lawyer, felt that I could so testify. Perhaps, in one sense, a little of any knowledge goes a long way there. At least, a man is not always called to immediate account, because we have much of speech making that does not affect legislation. But appearing to-day before a society of experts, particularly when I am introduced as one in accord with the views of those experts, I have some timidity and trepidation, even though speaking has been somewhat my lot for several years past.

"I have, unfortunately, a subject much too big for anyone to cover in a single address. I am not going to talk to you about budgets generally, but rather narrow my subject to the legislative side of budgets as it applies to the House of Representatives of the United States.

"Government is a matter of evolution, and probably the cause of more failures to reform methods of doing business in government—city, State, or National—is the fact that the man proposing the reform faces it from the outside rather than from the inside. Governments, like men, are always narrowed and restricted by habits—personal habits, if I may be pardoned for such a use of the word—habits that restrict their activity and their initiative just as it does every single individual; and when you undertake, without regard to those habits, to put upon a government any new method, the inevitable result is a failure. I remember talking just a couple of days ago to a gentleman of wide experience with our Government, and he recalled to my mind the very great expense that was incurred by the Government in undertaking a reform in the Public Printing Office, a reform that, on paper, ought to have worked splendidly, and yet the result of which was the expenditure of about $100,000 and now the daily discarding of the method that had been superimposed upon that establishment, simply because the men who undertook it had no real knowledge of the life history of that institution and the evolution of it. Therefore, their methods were not adaptable and could not be successful.

"I have never known a fundamental change proposed in the procedure of the Congress of the United States that ever was adopted permanently or that during its short trial proved successful. You constantly hear reference to the English method of doing things, or the French method. In the recent debate during the contest over the power of the Speaker of the House of Representatives constant allusion was made to the fact that the English speaker was simply a presiding officer, and that the American Speaker should be made into simply a presiding officer. Now, that may be theoretically an ideal system, and yet one of the characteristics of American political life from the very inception of this Government has been that the speakers of legislative bodies have been leaders of the dominant party in control of legislation of the House, and to ignore that fact and to undertake to abolish it overnight was to ignore the life history of American governmental development.

"Before I touch directly on the question that I want to present to you of proposed reform I want to deal just for a moment with what might be called the executive side of the American budget. And even before I touch on that let me suggest this curious fact to you: In American political life everywhere, except in the Congress of the United States, there is a marked tendency toward concentration of power, with corresponding responsibility. For instance, you gentlemen who deal largely with city government know the tremendous strides that have been made toward the commission form of government; and where even the commission form of government has not been taken up, the mayor of the city has been given supreme power over the boards, power over appointments, power of removal; and, given this large power, he is held to a direct responsibility, the reason for it being that the people have neither the time, the inclination, nor, in a sense, the technical knowledge to enable them to follow details, but are looking to general results. And so they have insisted on giving to one or a limited number of men full power, and making them responsible. And yet the fight that has just taken place in the House of Representatives was a fight not to concentrate power and make responsibility as a result of it, but was to deprive the Speaker of power and diffuse that power among the Members generally. It is a rather curious fact that with that marked tendency everywhere else, in the House of Representatives there should have come the demand that power should be taken from the Speaker and given to the membership generally. How far that has been a wise change, time alone can tell. I have never been one of those who believed that you necessarily reformed a system by changing the method of selecting the men who were to administer it; and the reform that took place in the House of Representatives by taking from the Speaker the power of appointing committees and giving it to a committee on committees did not, to my mind, reach the real evil, which was not the power in one man to appoint committees, but the power in the committees after appointment to stifle and control legislation in that body. And the remedy, in my judgment, lay in changing the power of the committees rather than changing the authority from which they sprang.

"Now, in regard to the executive side of the budget. Of course, you gentlemen are familiar with the fact that America differs very much in its political arrangement from the English Government, and, indeed, from most of the European Governments. The theory of the makers of the Constitution was a separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments—a separation that has continued and must continue without a radical fundamental change in our Constitution. That makes impossible of consideration, or at least unnecessary of consideration, the many propositions that are presented of budgets in countries where the ministry is the government and where they present the budget in the legislature and their failure to successfully carry it through means a change of party or an appeal to the people. Here the Executive presents a budget that may come to a majority in a Congress that is friendly, or may come to a majority that is hostile; and therefore it is impossible to bring about that same degree of responsibility to the makers of the budget that they have in England and in some other countries. We have provided by law that the Secretary of the Treasury shall receive from the other heads of the departments the estimates for the ensuing fiscal year, these estimates to be submitted to him by the 15th of October, and by him submitted to Congress upon its opening in December of each year. It is made his duty to assemble them and to present them to the Congress in the form that has been usual in presentation of the estimates of the various departments. And if they are submitted to him in a form other than that in which they have heretofore been submitted, it is his duty to put them in the proper form, leaving to a footnote any suggested change in form. Within the last two years we have required of him also that he should estimate the revenues for the ensuing year and the probable appropriations necessary for the maintenance of the Government; and if it was found that the appropriations should exceed the estimated revenues, then he should certify that fact to the President of the United States, that the President, in communicating to Congress, might inform it how the appropriation could either be curtailed or the revenue increased. That change, brought about by a provision put upon one of the supply bills, has worked very well recently. But it does not, to my mind, go as far as it should. The President has shown a very commendable zeal in trying to cut down the estimates that are annually submitted to Congress, and he has undertaken to carefully examine the estimates of the various departments and has reported to Congress, through the Secretary of the Treasury, very large reductions in estimates over those originally submitted.

"But, to my mind, what ought to be done is to require that the Secretary of the Treasury shall revise the estimates of every other department of the Government. It is unnecessary to state to you gentlemen, who are so familiar with the subject, that the estimates come from the various members of the Cabinet—from the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster General, the Department of Justice, and so on. As it is now, there is no member of the Cabinet who has any power of revision over the estimates that are submitted by other members of the Cabinet. The Secretary of the Treasury in this regard is simply no more than a clerk to gather together and present in book form to the Congress these various estimates. John Sherman, one of the very greatest of the Secretaries of the Treasury that this country ever had, undertook to get the power to supervise the estimates of the other members of the Cabinet. But naturally everyone of the other Secretaries objected to having a veto power given to anyone else over the budget that he presented. And so the matter failed. But Congress could well afford to give to one member of the Cabinet not only the power but to make it his duty to revise these estimates. And the reason of that would be this: You would then compel a certain consideration by the executive department of the budget as a whole. There is a tendency for each Secretary to consider the needs of his department only; and not unusually the sum total of the estimates to be submitted is found not by any consideration of the Government's power to raise revenue, not by any consideration of the relative merits of this department's demands as against that department's demands, but simply by the opinion that the head of each department has of its needs and then a sum in addition. And so I believe that one of the reforms that should be had and that could be had without in any way changing the present form of government would be to empower and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to revise the estimates. Of course we can not require the President. We can simply do as we did in this instance that I speak of, require the Secretary to communicate to the President that the President may, in turn, inform Congress. But the fatal mistake in the provision enacted was that it required the Secretary of the Treasury only to inform the President when he found the estimated revenues to be less than the estimated appropriations for the ensuing year. Now, the reason for it exists just as much in a case where the revenues of the country may be sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses as it does where we are likely to have a deficit in the revenues. And unless the duty is imposed upon him you will not have other than through the initiative of some Executive desirous of bringing about reform that supervision and consideration of the different items that go to make up the budget. We have in other particulars followed what seems to be a very good plan. The beginning of the fiscal year is near enough to the time when the estimates are submitted and near enough to the period at which those estimates are likely to have been enacted into law to bring about as much accuracy as possible in dealing with the future. In that particular I think that the American system is all that it should be. We have also passed very stringent laws in regard to the creation of deficits, and have done much to require the keeping within the year of the expenses of the departments and not to permit the borrowing from a future year for the expenses of a current year, so as to enable the Government and the legislative branch of it to know without serious difficulty what the appropriations for a particular year happen to be.

"And now, with that very cursory and loose statement as to the executive side of the budget, I desire to talk to you of the House of Representatives relative to the preparation and consideration of a budget.

"Up until the Civil War the Committee on Ways and Means had jurisdiction over both the levying of taxes and the appropriation of the revenues. It very properly, from the standpoint of theory, had charge of those two highest functions of government, the levying of taxes and the spending of money raised as a result of the levy. But in 1865, largely on account of the tremendous labors that were being imposed upon that committee, a division took place and there was created the Committee on Appropriations, and given to it exclusive power over the appropriation bills, leaving to the Ways and Means Committee the power it now has of exclusively considering the revenue bills. In this country it has been supposed by some people that there was not that same need for having a central authority over matters of raising revenue and matters of expenditure that existed in other countries. To my mind that is a mistake. It has been true, and probably will be true for many years, that Congress will levy taxes frequently for purposes and reasons other than the raising of revenue. But it ought to be true that somewhere in a legislative body there should be some central authority to consider the levying of taxes and the raising of revenue in connection with the appropriation of moneys for the maintenance of the Government. Nothing is stronger evidence of a bad system of government than the piling up either of huge surpluses, that are a constant invitation to extravagance, or the failure to provide sufficient revenues to meet the ordinary and necessary expenses of the Government. And to properly prevent that, there must be cooperation somewhere between that power that first formulates the bill to levy the taxes and that power that first formulates the bill disposing of the money so raised. But we have not only separated these two functions of raising revenue and of disbursing revenue, but in 1880 we took from the Committee on Appropriations control over the Agriculture appropriation bill; and that was followed in 1885 by taking from them control over the appropriation bills relative to the Army, the Navy, Indian affairs, foreign affairs, and rivers and harbors; so that to-day the Committee on Appropriations has control of 6 out of the 14 supply bills, and you have seven or eight different roads to the Treasury; and as Mr. Tawney, the former chairman of the Appropriations Committee, very happily said, 'As many byways as there are members of these appropriating committees.' The result of that has been that there is not now any consideration in Congress of the appropriations as a whole. No man knows what the Sixty-second Congress will appropriate, or, rather, what one session of the Sixty-second Congress will appropriate, until that session has passed into history and he has added up the appropriations that have been made. Now, a more indefensible system can hardly be imagined, that a great Government appropriating, as we do, two thousand millions of dollars during the life of each Congress—at least we have for the past four years, and from all indications will continue to do so—that a Government appropriating two billions of dollars should not know until it goes through the addition of the various sums appropriated what the total is going to be, is a proposition that to my mind is absolutely indefensible. [Applause.]

"Now, what is the remedy? There are those who dream that we are going to turn back and give to the Committee on Appropriations the entire control over the appropriation bills. Theoretically that might be wise, but to my mind there is no more probability of the Committee on Appropriations ever getting control over all of the supply bills than there is of any other reversion to outworn conditions in this country. The Members of the House of Representatives are compelled through political exigency into personal activity, a personal activity the lack of which means political extinction. The result is that you will never get, at least not for many years, until public opinion has much changed, that condition of service in the House of Representatives that you have in the Parliament of England, where the average member of Parliament only attends when there is some vote or division of primary importance. He takes no part in the preparation or the discussion of the budget, but leaves to the leaders the consideration entirely of the budget and the other great matters of legislation. That can not happen in this country. The man who here would be content simply to vote, whether justly or unjustly, would be condemned by his constituents as a man lacking in real energy or force in the House of Representatives. The result is that there is a constant pressure of interest on every Member in the House to have some part and some voice in, something to say, something to do with, the daily affairs of the House. Now, that in some ways is a good thing; in some ways it is anything but a good thing. That being true, you are not going to get the present committees that have appropriating power to surrender that power and give it into the hands of one committee. Nearly every man to-day who is a member of an appropriating committee in the House, other than the Committee on Appropriations, is jealous of and fighting that Committee on Appropriations, because he claims that it is constantly reaching out and seeking to get back the old power it had of control over all appropriations. And that being true, it being to my mind impossible from a political and practical standpoint to bring about again the concentration of power in the hands of one committee, and because the detail work is now beyond the capacity of that one committee, I have offered an amendment to the rules of the House that I hope may have in it the seed of a reform we all admit ought to be brought about.

"In substance it is this: That there shall be created a new committee called, if you please, a committee on the budget, or on receipts and expenditures. That committee shall be composed of the chief members of the Ways and Means Committee, the Appropriations Committee, and the chairmen and ranking minority member of every other appropriating committee. Now, what has been attempted in its personnel was this: To give to the members of the Ways and Means Committee and of the Appropriations Committee sufficient numerical strength to prevent the chairmen of the other appropriating committees from combining and so controlling the budget that should be presented to Congress, and for this reason—it follows inevitably and without regard to personnel—that the men who represent simply one department and appropriate for one department, become in course of time the champions instead of the critics of that department. In our system of government it is highly important that the legislative body should be the critic of the executive body, not the unfair critic, but still, when the estimates are submitted to the House through the Secretary of the Treasury, the House in its consideration should be free to criticize, amend, reduce, and curtail. But when you give to one committee simply jurisdiction over that part of the budget that relates to one department its members inevitably come into such relationship with the executive of that department, particularly if those of the majority happen to belong to the same political party that the executive branch of the Government represents, that they become his champion. And so you find that the chairman and members of the Committee on Military Affairs are fighting to increase their dominion and power by increasing the power and dominion of the Army of the United States. And the chairman and members of the Committee on Naval Affairs are doing the same thing for the Navy; the chairman and members of the Committee on Post Offices for post offices. And as a result, in the life of the past Congress, the material saving that was made over the estimates submitted by the various departments was made by the Committee on Appropriations and not by any one of the committees appropriating for single departments; not that the personnel of the Appropriations Committee is any better, any more patriotic, or any more intelligent, but through the duties that are imposed upon them they have to take a survey of the Government as a whole, and they do not, therefore, become the champions, or rarely do, of any particular department.

"The exact proposal is as follows:

"Resolved, That the following rule be added to the rules of the House, and to be known as section 6 to Rule X:

"'SEC. 6. There shall be a Committee on Estimates and Expenditures, whose personnel shall consist of the following members: The chairman and three ranking majority members, and the ranking minority member of the Committees on Ways and Means and Appropriations, and the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committees on Rules, Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, the Post Office and Post Roads, Rivers and Harbors, and Indian Affairs. The chairman of said committee shall be selected by the members thereof. Said committee shall, as soon after the convening of each regular session of Congress as may be, report to the House the amount of revenue probably available for appropriation for the next fiscal year, and apportion the amount to the several appropriation bills within the jurisdiction of the committees empowered by the rules and practice of the House to report appropriations from the Treasury. This report, or supplementary reports to meet exigencies of the public service, may be made on any legislative day after the reading of the Journal, and when agreed to by the House shall limit the totals of the appropriations reported by the several committees.'

"You see, I provided that the committee should be composed of such ranking members of the Ways and Means, which I believe should be represented as the committee which deals with the levying of taxes; the Committee on Appropriations, and only the chairman and ranking minority member of the other appropriating committees, and the Rules Committee, so that the personnel taken from Ways and Means and Appropriations should equal the personnel taken from these other appropriating committees; that it is made the duty of that committee to submit to Congress at the beginning, or as early thereafter as possible, an entire budget, and to allot the various sums from that budget that can be appropriated for the various departments. In other words, if a budget of a thousand million dollars is brought in, that committee shall then, in presenting it, say that one hundred millions of this goes to the Army, one hundred and twenty-five millions goes to the Navy, one hundred and twenty millions goes to pensions—of course, I am dealing loosely in figures, as you gentlemen will understand—and so on down. And when the report of this committee is adopted by the House it shall be a limitation upon the appropriating power of each of the appropriating committees.

"That, in substance, is the plan, and this is what I hope to accomplish by it: A real consideration by Congress and, as a result of that, a real consideration by the American people of the budget as a whole. Our work in Congress to-day is all sharpshooting. We spend our time in discussing the particular items, fighting this item or that item. Now, that is important work. That is work that I would not eliminate from Congress, but it is not the whole work, and unless you have on the part of Congress a consideration of the budget as a whole, you will neither develop men of broad statesmanship nor will you present to the people any real question of economy in the administration of the Government, or any real issue on which parties ought to be formed and by which you can create party responsibility.

"As it is each bill comes in reported by a particular committee. It is examined with more or less care by the membership of the whole House, according as their particular interests may be in that matter, and it goes through the regular procedure, being first considered in the Committee of the Whole and then reported back to the House, then to the Senate, and from there, through conference and agreement of both Houses, to the President, and then becomes a law. But there are not many men in the House who could tell you the relative size of appropriations for war purposes, for instance, as against peace purposes, or for the machinery of government itself, aside from the actual things it does by that machinery. And yet those are the really important questions. What the people of America want to know about are these great totals. It is absolutely impossible to interest 90,000,000 people in the little details of legislation. But if you could present to them the fact that you have had a growth of nearly 100 per cent in the last 16 years in your appropriations, with only a corresponding growth of a little over 20 per cent in population, you have then a big question, one worthy of the serious consideration of the American people. Under this system the majority party would bring in its budget; the minority party attacks that budget; the majority party makes its record, and at the next election goes to the country and on that record stands or falls. Then you have a real issue and you have real party responsibility.

"One of the reasons that you are seeing the peculiar political condition where insurgency is rife in both parties is because, with the exception of that side of the budget which deals with the levying of taxes, you have had no real issue on which parties are made, and there is nothing that the people can consider. Now, while the individual legislator is important in government, I believe that you never get the highest results except through party responsibility, by party initiative, and by party criticism. The trouble with parties that the people complain of now vanishes when you have real issues that those parties stand and divide on, and when the people can get genuine relief from one system by taking up the party that advocates a different system. There is nothing of that kind to-day. There is not the slightest consideration of a budget in any true sense of the word; there is no way, unless you drag it in by the heels, whereby a man can properly make a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives dealing with the entire expenditures of the Government of the United States.

"Now, whether this reform can be brought about is a very serious question. I had hoped to present it before the organization of the present House that I might then have had the advantage of not undertaking to curtail the power of any particular man, because after your committees are formed, when you undertake a reform you are immediately confronted with the personal equation, and the personal equation is a very powerful factor in legislation and legislative reforms. But had it been possible to present this plan before the House committee were named, then no man could necessarily have known that his power would be curtailed. It is still my hope that this reform may take place. That it will take place in time I have not the slightest doubt, because it is inconceivable that we should long continue our present method. We have been peculiarly fortunate, we have had a country so wonderfully rich, we have had such unbounded resources that we could always raise revenue sufficient to satisfy even the most extravagant of parties or the most extravagant of administrations. But with budgets that are growing by leaps and bounds, with an annual expenditure of a billion dollars, we are approaching that time, if we have not already reached it, when we have to consider the capacity of the Government to raise money sufficient to pay this tremendous sum annually. And when that question becomes acute, when you have to face not simply the general policy of tariff, or whether you will levy a tax for protection purposes or for revenue purposes, but when you have to consider how you can raise enough money to keep from having a deficit, then you are going to have such a situation as will force a change in the legislative procedure whereby you will have consideration of a budget as a whole.

"Mr. Chairman, of necessity I have talked in a rather desultory way, and I do not know that I have covered the ground, yet there does not occur to me right now any further suggestion. Summarizing my remedy, so far as it be a remedy, it is, first, to make the Executive, through a single Cabinet officer, present a budget that has been considered not only by the individual heads of bureaus, but has been considered in regard to the relation of these totals to each other; and, secondly, the creation in the legislative branch of a committee that in its labors will have to consider the subject as a whole, and in its presentation to the House as a whole will require of it a similar consideration.

"If I have not made myself altogether clear and there is any gentleman who would like to ask any questions, I would be very glad to answer them, because sometimes I find that interrogation brings about clarity of statement very much more than an attempt to speak without interruption. Otherwise, I beg to thank you all for your attention."

THE WOOLEN SCHEDULE.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bill 11019, to reduce the duties on wool and woolen manufactures.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill 11019.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the experience we have passed through to-day shows it to be true that the less a Member of the House knows about what is going on the more time he consumes. We have wasted nearly four hours in the discussion of two resolutions, and we have wasted those four hours largely because the Members had not an opportunity to inform themselves about them. It may be that that is the reason why the debate on the wool schedule has lasted so long.

A very distinguished gentleman, a former Member of another body, said at one time that there were not 10 men in the United States who understood the wool schedule, and when one of those gentlemen was taken sick consideration of that schedule had to be postponed.

I do not think that my efforts here this afternoon are going to demonstrate that I am entitled to be admitted to that galaxy of statesmen who are supposed to understand the wool schedule, but there are some things about Schedule K that I do know. It has often seemed to me that that is the best letter in the alphabet to designate that schedule. First, because K is the crooked letter of the alphabet. It stands for knavery and it stands for kite, a vulture that preys upon the people of this country. There are things in Schedule K which no man can fail to find if he gives the subject any study. They stand out like a sore thumb, and I propose to call the attention of the House to one of the worst discriminations which exists in that schedule; and I will claim for my party that, if we have achieved no other result, we will have justified ourselves before the people for the time that we have spent in the preparation and discussion of this bill by wiping out that one discrimination.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] made a very interesting speech the other day with reference to worsteds, one that showed that he had given great study to that particular item of Schedule K. He criticized our side of the House, however, because we had not put worsted cloth upon the free list, and he did not give full credit to us for what we actually did to the gentlemen who have so long been able to control legislation with reference to that schedule. I have made somewhat of a study of that item myself, and it is an interesting subject. I doubt if I shall be able to impart even the little information that I have to the membership of this body this afternoon, but I shall do my best.

Manufacturers of woolen cloth may be divided into two classes, those who manufacture the soft woolen cloth and those who manufacture the hard-finished worsted cloth. I might say, in passing, that the former class is usually found on this side of the aisle and the latter on the other. The manufacturer of woolen cloth of the former class uses first-class wool, and the manufacturer of worsted cloth uses wool of the second class. Section 366 of Schedule K of the Payne law deals with this subject. I do not mean to say that the author of the Payne law is responsible for this situation and this state of affairs, because, so far as I can learn, it has existed since 1867; but the language of that act is so carefully drawn that first-class wool pays, when it comes into this country unwashed, a certain duty, and coming in washed it pays double that duty. While to the ordinary reader it would appear that they were both included in precisely the same category, yet it appears on investigation that second-class wool pays only one duty, whether it comes in washed or unwashed.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. Does that not arise from the fact that we have a specific form of duty rather than an ad valorem?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. No; that has not anything to do with this particular fact. It is the language of the law, cleverly and cunningly drawn, presumably at the instance of a man who had something to be gained by legislation that results in this state of affairs. You can read it over and over again, and I venture to say, if no one has called your attention to it, that you will never discover the joker in section 366 of Schedule K. See how smoothly and plainly it reads:

> The duty on wools of the first class which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed, and the duty on wools of the first and second class which shall be imported scoured shall be, etc.

It thus leaves out of the classification entirely washed wool of the second class. Now, since 1867 men have been legislating with reference to this schedule. This language has been there all that time, and yet there was nobody who had sufficient interest, patriotism, and knowledge all at one time to correct the error. This has resulted very detrimentally to the gentlemen who are engaged in the manufacture of woolen goods which pay the double duty.

Mr. SHARP. May I ask the gentleman another question right there? I do not want to interrupt him continuously.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I have no objection.

Mr. SHARP. I merely ask for information. Does that not also work an injustice to a certain class of woolgrowers in this country?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, undoubtedly it works an injustice to a certain class of woolgrowers in this country, because it gives an advantage to the worsted manufacturer. The worsted manufacturer is the manufacturer who consumes a great deal of foreign wool, and he is the competitor in the market of the woolen manufacturer, who consumes much of our home-grown wool. It gives him a tremendous advantage in more ways than one, and I will try to reach them in their order. In the first place the woolen manufacturer pays this high duty on his raw material, and the woolen weaver must pay that high duty on that raw material as compared with the low duty on the raw material of the worsted manufacturer. This gives him a tremendous advantage, and he has enjoyed that advantage since 1867. In addition to that, worsted wools coming in shrink considerably less than the other wools, so that the amount of duty or the amount of protection that the woolgrower receives depends upon the amount of wool there is left after it is scoured. Thus the worsted man bringing in his raw material has a considerable higher percentage of actual wool left after it is scoured than the man who brings in the other wool.

Mr. SHARP. Does not that illustrate what I sought to get at in my first question, that a specific duty does play an important part, because it has to do with the weight and not the ad valorem?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The specific duty plays a tremendous part all through this schedule.

Mr. SHARP. That is what I thought.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The point I was trying to make was that the language of the act, obstensibly dealing with first and second class wools, dealt with only one class, so that the manufacturer who uses one wool was paying a certain duty and the manufacturer who uses the other had to pay a double duty, giving an advantage to the manufacturer who used the foreign wool to the detriment and great distress of the manufacturer who relies upon the production of our own product. Now, not only was the worsted manufacturer benefited in that respect, paying only one-half the duty that is paid by his brother, the wool manufacturer, but he was also in receipt of a high tariff upon his by-products, because the worsted manufactnrer only uses the long threads or hairs of the wool, more suitable for spinning into tight twisted threads than the shorter forms of wool. In combing and laying those threads in a manner suitable for him and, proceeding with its manufacture into worsted yarn he removes the short threads and noils which are part of the raw material of his rival—the woolen manufacturer. Now, then, he receives his raw material at about half what his rival pays, and he is then in a position to sell back to him at more than double that duty the by-product which his rival must use. By a trick he gets the raw material at a low rate and he is permitted to charge this by-product at a rate which is prohibitory. Now, as I said, the worsted spinner when he imports raw material also benefits tremendously by the shrinkage, so that he gets his raw material in at about 15 cents a pound, and he gets 20 to 30 cents per pound on this by-product which must be purchased by his competitor. The present law has remedied all that. It applies a duty of 20 cents per pound——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to ask for information, and I would be very glad if the gentleman will tell me what the percentage of manufactured wool is in the domestic market in this country.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. What the percentage is——

Mr. RICHARDSON. What the percentage of the manufactured wool that is used at home, leaving a certain percentage to come in from foreign countries.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think we produce, roughly speaking, about 50 per cent of the wool consumed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then that leaves an import of about 50 per cent, does it?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think so; roughly speaking, about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the gentleman is not accurate——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. No; I do not pretend to be.

Mr. HARDY. I think the last showing was 327,000,000 pounds home production and 252,000,000 pounds, along about that, of foreign wool.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. My recollection is that we produce about half the wool we need in this country. That varies from year to year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The domestic market consumes about one-half of the manufactured wool, not of the raw wool, but of the manufactured wool, in this country.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think the domestic market consumes practically all of the manufactured wool. I do not think we export to any great extent.

Mr. SIMS. What do I understand the gentleman to mean by the term "manufactured wool?"

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think the gentleman from Alabama meant cloth. I misunderstood him.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman used it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is, of course, a difference between manufactured wool and raw wool.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I thought manufactured wool ceases to be raw wool, and I understand is subject to the very highest competition with the world's manufactured wool, is it not?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. At this time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. At this time; right now—1911.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Raw wool is in a competitive condition.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The highest order of competition.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Well, I would not say that. It is competitive now, because we import a lot of wool.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I merely wanted to get the gentleman's idea.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. To show you how this schedule works out, the present law places a duty of 22 cents upon a pound of washed-down clothing wool. "Down" is a word used to designate a particular kind of wool. If that wool comes into this country washed at the present time—the short wool they use for clothing purposes—it pays a duty of 22 cents a pound. If, on the other hand, washed-down wool of the kind possible for the spinner to use, comes into this country, it pays a duty of only 12 cents a pound. The most remarkable thing about this whole wool schedule, it seems to me, is the fact that this has practically escaped the notice and knowledge of Members of the House and Senators who have legislated with reference to it. This is one of the most pronounced jokers in the woolen schedule.

The proposed law puts a duty of 20 per cent on all three classes of wool. There should be no difficulty about collecting that duty. Wool, as a rule, is sold at public auction in the London or Liverpool markets. The duty is collected on the value, and everybody knows precisely what a man pays for a cargo of wool when he buys it in the open market. Twenty per cent of that is collected from him before he is permitted to bring it into these ports. Whether it is washed, unwashed, or scoured, all these discriminations and classifications which it is impossible for the average man, or even for a highly intelligent man, to make anything out of when he is reading the present law have been wiped away. One schedule of the present law will say "that the duty on this item shall be two and one-half times as much as the duty on something else, and then 40 per cent ad valorem"; "the duty on a pound of this shall be half the duty on a pound of something else, and so much added ad valorem." It was intended, it seems to me, in cold blood, when this schedule was first brought into existence, to have it in such shape that it would defy the intelligence of men of ordinary understanding. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The consequence of this situation is that the woolen manufacturer has been driven to a great extent from the field by his worsted rival. The importation of woolen goods has been largely of the woolen class and not of the worsted. Little of that made by the worsted man has come into this country. Of course, there are people in this country who insist on having the imported goods. There are men whom you and I know who insist upon having imported goods, and care little or nothing what the tariff may be, but so far as the ordinary citizen is concerned the worsted cloth that comes into this country does not affect the price of his clothing. The woolen man, consequently, has been ground between the upper and nether millstones of the competition of the worsted man at home and the foreigner abroad, because the worsted man was getting his raw material at practically half of what the woolen weaver was paying and the foreigner was not paying any tax upon his raw material at all. So that, so far as he was concerned, in a schedule which was highly protective they were not willing to be fair and divide with him and give him a part of the plunder. No. It was certain gentlemen who represented certain interests which were influential here who were able to arrange that schedule to the disadvantage of their rivals in business and the American people and reap the profits for themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The yarn spinner is the man who prepares the product of the worsted weaver. He takes that second-class wool which only pays one duty and spins it into worsted and sells it to the worsted weaver. He receives a shelter of protection to the extent of from 82 to 143 per cent ad valorem equivalent.

Here is another angle from which the joker can be seen. The worsted weaver can not protect himself against the worsted spinner unless he also becomes a worsted spinner, because the worsted spinners are in a position to charge him, by combining together, any percentage of the income of his business that they choose by raising the price of the raw material. So the worsted man is in a very fortunate position. I have a pamphlet issued by the carded-woolen people in which the worsted men are pictured riding in a boy's wagon behind a goat—the woolen man being the goat.

The worsted spinner, the worsted weaver, and the woolen weaver are all at the mercy of the men who produce their raw materials. The worsted weaver, if he is not also a worsted spinner, is probably in a worse position than the manufacturer of woolen goods, because the duty of 82 to 143 per cent makes it absolutely impossible for him to go anywhere else except to the worsted manufacturers of this country for his yarn. Out of all the goods that were imported into this country and all the worsted that is used, there were only 290-odd thousand pounds of yarn of an exceptionally fine grade imported into this country. The worsted spinner has the people and the worsted weaver absolutely at his mercy.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. Inasmuch as the gentleman who has the floor and who is addressing the House hails from the State of New Jersey, I wish to say that during a recent visit that I made to my home, one of the largest retail merchants in my home town, in a conversation regarding the wool tariff, told me—and he is of the opposite political faith, he being a Republican—that in the last few years the price on a certain high grade of cloth had been raised to him about 75 per cent. He referred, I think, to the American Worsted Co., of the State of New Jersey, and he characterized it as one of the most powerful trusts there was in existence to-day. I would like to ask some information from the gentleman, if he is able to give it, upon the operations of that so-called trust.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Well, we have a lot of mosquitoes in New Jersey, and we have a lot of trusts in New Jersey, and I have some doubts as to which of those two classes of pests is the most numerous. [Laughter.] The existence of a Woolen Trust would not be likely to attract my notice, being an inhabitant of the State of New Jersey, unless it was specifically called to my attention; but I am not sure but that the organization to which the gentleman refers is in my district, and I am a little bit uneasy as to just what effect the speech I am now making will have upon them. [Laughter.]

Now, one of the results of the present law—that is, the present Payne law, which ought to interest the woolgrowers—is this: When the price is high, and on account of the heavy shrinkage, the woolen man finds it difficult to pay for wool produced at home, or on account of the tariff tax and shrinkage to pay for wool produced abroad, being beset at the same time by the competition of the worsted manufacturers, whose product is side by side with his own in every tailor shop in the land, he is compelled to betake himself to substitutes for wool, such as cotton and shoddy. Now, it seems to me that there is something that ought to draw the attention of gentlemen who are supposed to be, and I know are, sincerely interested in the welfare of the wool producers of this country. They are supposed to be receiving 11 cents per pound protection, but really they compete with the light-shrinking wool that finally comes into competition with them, and it transpires that they are receiving a protection of only 6½ cents a pound under the present law. Yet that 11 cents has been dangled out before their eyes, and they conscientiously believe they have been receiving it all these years, and in return for that they have been asked to stand for the robbery and plunder of the balance of the American people at the hands of these manufacturers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe that one effect of this bill will be to increase the consumption of home-grown wool, because it will put the woolen man and the worsted man more on an equality. It will give the woolen man "more of a chance," as the boys say, "for his white alley." There have been many wool factories in this country, the owners of which have been driven into exile and the mills themselves shut down on account of the inequalities and discriminations of this legislation, and yet, strange to say, it is only within a very short time, so far as I can learn, that they have discovered what was the matter with them and uncovered the inequalities of the law.

Here is a bulletin published by the Carded Wool Manufacturers' Association of Boston, which I wish every Member of this House would procure for himself and read. It is absolutely amazing to think that men of brains and intelligence sufficient to enable them to acquire fortunes and take care of themselves in the ordinary channels of trade and commerce should so long have been abused in this way without actually knowing that it was taking place.

The gentleman from Illinois, my good friend Mr. MANN was discussing the question of shoddy the other day, and he delivered himself of a rather peculiar line of philosophy, I thought, when he objected most strenuously to permitting our own people to be robbed and swindled by the sale of shoddy, but thought it was a good practice for us to carry on those tactics abroad. I will say that I have not investigated and do not know how much shoddy we do use, nor how much percentage per capita, but he left the impression with the House, or at least on my mind, that the reason we were not consuming much shoddy in this country was because we were consuming a tremendous amount of wool and were getting good, warm wool in our clothing instead of shoddy. He proudly pointed out the fact that the soldiers of our country were the only soldiers of any country who were clothed in wool. Well, I happen to know that that statement is partially true, at least it was true in 1898, that the American soldiers were clothed with wool, because they sent us, clothed in heavy woolen suits, down to Jacksonville, Fla., in the middle of the summer; and strangely enough, when cooler weather came, when September and October rolled around, and we were ordered to go North again, they issued to us khaki clothing. [Laughter.]

But I have investigated the figures as to the consumption of wool in this country, and I find that we consume 7.11 pounds per capita annually, while in England, where the condition of the workingman is supposed to be so vastly inferior to our own, I find that they consume 8.91 pounds per capita annually; and those figures are for home consumption entirely. They do not include the amount of wool actually used and exported; for if they did, we would find that as against 7.11 pounds used in America annually per capita the consumption of wool in England is 19.62 pounds, showing conclusively that for some reason or other, despite the tremendous prices that the American people pay for their clothing, they are not getting clothing made of wool. I do not know whether it is made of shoddy or paper or this stuff that they put into the trusts when they overcapitalize them—water. I do not know what it is, but I do know that it is not wool, because the per capita consumption of this country shows that we are not being clothed with wool.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I will be delighted.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I should like to ask the gentleman where he gets his figures as to the amount of consumption of woolen products and how he arrives at the figures?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I got the figures of the English consumption from the report of the board of trade of England.

Mr. MANN. I mean in this country.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I must admit that I got that from the report of the Committee on Ways and Means. The gentleman will find in that report that the annual consumption in this country is stated to be 7.11 pounds. I have no doubt the figures are correct.

Mr. MANN. I have seen those figures questioned. That is the reason I ask.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I have made no independent investigation of that.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman from New Jersey add that the per capita consumption of wool in this country is considerably less than it was 20 years ago?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes; that is true. It is less at this time than it was 20 years ago. I think at some period between then and now it has been greater, but it is less now than it was 20 years ago.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if the consumption of wool in America was not the greatest when we had free trade in wool in America?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. That is my recollection; yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask if the last year of the Wilson bill did not show a greater consumption of wool in America than at any other time, previous or subsequent.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman has not the statistics on that, has he?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is misinformed.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct. I do know that the woolen weaving industry flourished during that period more than at any other time in its history.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to inquire if in 1897, the last year of the Wilson bill, there was not consumed in America 601,000,000 pounds of wool, the greatest year of consumption before or since?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I am not familiar with those figures; I have no doubt they are correct.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to say that the report on wool from 1840 to 1910 shows that in that year—1897—there were 601,000,000 pounds of wool consumed in America, and in the last year there was 581,000,000 pounds. Now, I desire to ask one more question and then I am done.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. So long as the gentleman does not care whether I answer or not.

Mr. FOWLER. No. The gentleman said that if we could get a reduction on wool we could get good woolen clothes instead of having clothes not made out of wool, and that there had been watered stock put in some companies manufacturing woolen goods, or to that effect. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that they have also put in electricity, which is verified by the rapidity with which they are going down into our pockets and taking our money for shoddy goods? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I am glad that the gentleman does not insist on an answer.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I want, with the permission of the gentleman from New Jersey, to commend the gentleman from Illinois to the study of the report, when he will find that the majority of this wool that he says was consumed was carried over in subsequent years. I think as high as a million pounds was carried over from one year to another. He will find that it was not consumed, although it was imported and dumped in here; it was carried over, and not consumed for some years afterwards.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the statement he is about to put in the RECORD has been put in, to my knowledge, two different times. The gentleman from Illinois, in his speech, referred to that statement, and I think the committee understands it. There is no doubt about the accuracy of the figures the gentleman has. The question is whether or not the wool was imported for consumption in one year, or whether it was imported and carried over?

Mr. FOWLER. I wanted to ask the gentleman from New York how he accounts for the fact that in 1895 there was 509,000,000 pounds of wool consumed in America—a greater number of pounds than any previous year to that date?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that any question he desires to ask the gentleman from New York had better be addressed to him when the gentleman from New York makes his speech.

Mr. FOWLER. I beg pardon of the gentleman, because I did not want the gentleman to make a statement that there was wool carried over for that year.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman from New York is going to address the committee on the subject, and I have no doubt ample opportunity will be given the gentleman from Illinois to discuss that important feature of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, before I leave this branch of the subject I want to call the attention of the committee to the bulletin issued by the carded woolen manufacturers, under date of May 11, and I call attention to this paragraph. It occurs in a letter written by Edward Moir, the president of the Carded Woolen Manufacturers Association, the industry that is so discriminated against in the present legislation. He says:

I desire also to call your attention to the common belief that the prohibitory duties on heavy shrinking wool benefit the American wool-grower by forcing the manufacturer to use American wool. That is a great mistake. There is a well defined and by no means elevated limit to the price the buyer will pay for wool cloth. When that limit is passed the buyer turns to cloth made of mixtures of cotton, wool, and shoddy in order to get the goods at the price desired. The effect of these prohibitory duties on heavy shrinking wool are unmistakable. They benefit the worsted spinner by oppressing his competitor the carded woolen manufacturer. They force the consumers to clothe themselves with mixtures of cotton, shoddy, and wool. They injure the woolgrower by bringing into disrepute the tariff that should protect him.

The only complete remedy for the inequalities in the duties on wool are ad valorem rates. Such rates are fair to all, woolgrower, worsted spinner, carded-woolen manufacturer, clothier, and consumer. If the present specific tariff were changed to an equivalent ad valorem tariff, the effect would be to raise duties that are now below the average and to lower the duties that are now above the average. In other words, it would be equalization.

Mr. Chairman, in closing I want to say a few words about a subject which seems to cause great concern to our friends on the other side of the aisle, and that is the effect of this legislation upon the laboring classes of the country. I will say at the outset, if it was proposed in this bill to reduce the tariff to such a point that there would be serious danger of making it impossible for the manufacturer in this country to pay living wages, a desire on the part of anybody to lower the tariff to such an extent that it would be impossible for the American manufacturer to pay living wages to his men, why, then, gentlemen on this or the other side of the House are going to have difficulty in getting me to go along with them.

Mr. MANN. That is what we think.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not anticipate any trouble, however, on that score, because I have worked myself in the factories of the country, and I have worked for very low wages, and I do not think that all of the time I was employed in factories in the city of Paterson that I averaged a dollar a day, taking into account the time that I lost. I want to tell you something else. Your campaign book in 1905 published the amount of wages paid to the silk operatives throughout this country and the number of operatives engaged in such industry, and one day, having nothing else to do, I divided one into the other, and I found that, although this industry is protected to the extent of 50 per cent or more ad valorem, the wages received by the operatives in that particular industry amounted to the munificent sum of $335 per year.

Now, think of it! I will tell you something else when you get to talking about foreign competition with American labor. The fiercest competition that the silk manufacturers in the city of Paterson ever met did not come from abroad. Oh, no; it came from the State of Pennsylvania, where these gentlemen come from who are inveighing against a revision of the tariff for fear of injuring the laboring man. The situation existing up there in Pennsylvania was absolutely ideal for their purposes. Why, there the big, brawny men were working in the mines and the little boys were picking slate out of the coal as it shot down the chutes. Oh, I have seen them with their hands bleeding—little fellows who ought to be at home being attended to and taken care of by their mothers—I have seen them with their nails bleeding from the constant impact against the sharp corners of the slate. The men were employed and the boys were employed. There remained only to find some way of employing the infant girls. Suddenly some genius thought of the silk business—that was the thing. They came to my town and they enlisted the services of the manufacturers and showed them what a world of cheap labor there was to be had—a part of the miner's family which was not now being used. They induced the manufacturers to go up there; they built them their factories for nothing; they gave them coal at $1 a ton the year around; they remitted their taxes for 10 and 15 years; and they put these little girls to work. Took them out of the fields and off the hills, away from the schools, the prettiest and nicest little girls a man ever looked at. I have seen them up there, red cheeked, healthy, happy-eyed children, doomed for the future to pass their lives within the four brick walls of the silk mills of Pennsylvania. I saw them there working, and I saw the pay rolls.

I saw girls doing work in one mill in the State of Pennsylvania for $4 a week, and the scale in the city of Paterson then being paid was from $15 to $21. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Do you think that removing the tariff would be a benefit or better the condition of the laboring men in this country?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. My dear sir, I am coming to that in a moment, because I have been under the impression always, and I am still under the impression, that the tariff has nothing to do with wages [applause on the Democratic side], as the gentleman from Wisconsin very well said yesterday.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. And state, if you please, if there is any country that the sun shines on when it goes from east to west around this globe where the laboring man is so well fed, clothed, so well paid, and so happy as in the United States of America. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman can get time to make his speech. I have heard that statement so often it makes me tired. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The truth generally hurts——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say now there is any country where the condition of the laboring man is better than it is here, for, unfortunately, his condition is bad in a great many countries; but I will say, just as did the gentleman from Wisconsin on yesterday, that the wages and condition of workmen are fixed by a great many different contributory circumstances; and as he justly said, and as the father of HENRY GEORGE said before him, the land values in this country are one of the controlling things in fixing the wages in this country. So long as there are free lands here, so long as the price of agricultural labor is high, all labor will be high. The iron law of wages, of which Adam Smith speaks, arranges it so that a man will get enough to carry him into the mill the next day strong, vigorous, and able to give an entire day's work to his employer; the very law of wages fixes that in every corner of the globe. But you take the stand that you are doing something for the American laboring man when you enable his employer to plunder the people. You say to him, "I will give you part of the plunder," but he does not get it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not deny that the protective tariff, if carried to its logical conclusion—a combination or monopoly formed to take advantage of it—I do not deny that that will enable these gentlemen to pay high wages. But it does not compel them to pay those wages. If the billion or nearly dollars' worth of watered stock of the Steel Trust, that it now compels us to pay dividends on, had not been issued and that money was in the treasury of that company instead of going out in dividends on that watered stock, why of course they could pay tremendously high wages. I say while it enables them to pay high wages it does not compel them to pay high wages. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he indorses the taxation system of either HENRY GEORGE, or his distinguished father?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not know if the gentleman has ever read any of the articles——

Mr. SLOAN. I think I have read nearly all those of the elder and have heard some of the speeches of HENRY GEORGE, Jr.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I am sure the gentleman will agree with me, I find it very difficult indeed to disagree with the elder Mr. George.

Mr. SLOAN. Do you agree with him?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. To a large extent I do.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman's party agree with him?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, I am not speaking for my party.

Mr. HARDY. What has that to do with this question.

Mr. SLOAN. HENRY GEORGE and HENRY GEORGE's father are noted for distinctive ideas on taxation——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I suppose the gentleman is referring now to the single tax?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. And I want to limit my answer to that.

Mr. SLOAN. More particularly that.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. And so I say I find it very hard indeed to escape the conclusions drawn by Mr. George in such of his works as I have read.

I never heard a joint discussion between a single-taxer and a man opposed to the idea. There may be a good many arguments to be made on the other side of the proposition with which I am not familiar and which might affect my mind. But I must say that he seemed, so far as I have been able to observe, to make it very difficult, indeed, for a fair-minded man, with no preconceived convictions on the subject, to disagree with him.

Mr. SIMS. In the city of Washington we have the single tax where Congress legislates only, and intangible property, such as stocks, bonds, or anything of that sort, goes scot free. You want a single tax where Congress makes all the laws you have.

Mr. SLOAN. Do you want it in Tennessee?

Mr. SIMS. If I was like some of these millionaires here, with my property in bonds and stocks, I would want it here and be scot free of taxation.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I want to assure the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, that so far as I have been able to gather from my investigation of the subject, nobody has claimed that the labor cost of any of the articles contained in the different items of this schedule in any case exceeds 25 per cent. So that we are levying upon every item more than the amount of the total labor cost involved. Now, if gentlemen are fair and candid, they ought to stop talking about the inability of the American manufacturer to pay American wages, when in addition to the wages he does pay before he can bring his goods into the ports of this country he must pay a sum which is more than equivalent to the total labor cost of the article. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The wages paid in the woolen industry will stand examination, and the figures of the last census show—not the figures under the present census, which I think will show an increase, but the figures of the last census—that the average wages received in the woolen industry are $364 a year. Now, right at that point I want to read you——

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the average duty on wool and woolen goods?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The average duty is about 92 per cent, I think.

There is a pamphlet here headed, "The wool manufacture in America and Europe."

This company is in my district, at Passaic, N. J. Mr. Forsman is former president of the German tariff commission, and he is making a plea for the retention of the present duties. He employes three or four thousand hands in my district. This is one of the claims he makes why the present duty should be retained. This is one of the disabilities under which, he says, he labors:

> The operatives in American woolen mills, in spite of the very much higher wages paid, are largely drawn from the ranks of unskilled labor. And whence does this unskilled labor come? There is little of it among native-born Americans. It is taken from the steady flow of immigration into this country.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Here we have the situation. This gentleman insists upon an ad valorem tariff duty upon the things he sells, to wit, worsted and woolen goods, but at the same time the thing that he buys is coming in free at every port in this country.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Do not the statistics show that more than 60 per cent of the total mill employees in the country are foreigners?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It is my recollection that more than 60 per cent of the employees throughout the country are of that character.

Mr. HULL. The very character of labor about which they complain in other countries.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to go on, but I will yield.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman presents some tables in that statement, and I would like to ask him if he has examined them as to the wages paid in Germany and this country, and I would like to ask him, if he has examined them, to state whether or not they are correct.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think they are not. I think they are substantially incorrect; but I examined them nevertheless. Now, I would just like to say this: Anybody who knows anything about the labor question knows that the real cause of high wages in any line of industry is close, compact organization.

You will find men in industries that are capable of being organized receiving high wages. You will find men in industries that under present conditions are incapable of being highly organized receiving low wages. One of the things that the American workingmen ask at the hands of Congress is an opportunity to organize. They ask that they be not selected especially for the operation of the horrible writs of injunction which are never invoked against anybody else in the manner in which they are invoked against them. Now, instead of passing high tariffs, for which the workingmen are not asking you, if you really wanted to favor the American workingman why did you not, when you were in power all these years, pass an effective anti-injunction law that would permit him to go on strike and enable him to get some of the benefits which you give the manufacturer with the understanding that he would give part of it back to his workingmen in the form of higher wages? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question which I believe is not considered by him irrelevant, and that is this——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to know if, in the opinion of the gentleman, any tariff legislation will appreciably benefit the condition of the wage earners in this country?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does the gentleman mean tariff legislation now, or as a general proposition?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. As a general proposition.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. As a general proposition, no. Why should the manufacturer be expected to share with his workingmen? If I were dying to-night and were leaving money for my wife and my children, intrusting it to somebody, I would try to put him under bond, even if he were my closest friend; and in the same way why should we turn over to the manufacturer the opportunity to plunder the American people on his mere say-so that he, without giving bond of any kind, will turn over part of the plunder to somebody else? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a word further just there, rather in the way of explanation?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. My view being that no tariff legislation, in view of modern industrial developments and conditions, will tend appreciably to solve the economic and industrial problems confronting the wage earners in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In other words, I think the tariff is very largely a sham issue and a humbug, whether it is high tariff, low tariff, or no tariff, in so far as it involves the welfare of the American wage earner and the solution of the great issues that are really pressing upon the American people for solution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It might be possible for the American workingman to benefit from the tariff if he could effect a close and compact organization. For instance, if he could protect himself against immigration, if he had the genius to organize all the different branches of the different industries so that he himself could become a monopolist, so that he could say to the other monopolists, "When you are stealing from the people, steal enough for me and give it to me." [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] It might be possible for him then to benefit. But as it stands now, you give a monopoly to the manufacturer. You say: "We protect you from competition," and the 10 manufacturers, say, who were formerly operating independently, combine and raise the price and get the benefit, and simply refuse to carry out their compact and bargain. They go to the four ends of the earth to get cheap labor to enable them to evade the solemn obligations they entered into to pay part of their profits back in high wages to the American workmen. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The gentleman has undoubtedly received letters, as a number of us have, to the effect that certain reductions in the duties or the tariff taxes mean the cutting of the wages of the employees in the manufacturing concerns?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. Has the gentleman ever received a letter saying that it might reduce the dividends by a tenth of 1 per cent or cut the salary by 5 cents of an officer of the concern? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not think that question needs any answer. It answers itself. It used to be the common practice in this country, at the close of a campaign, for the manufacturers to post notices in their mills to the effect that if the Democrats elected a President their employees need not come back to work on Wednesday morning after election day, the election taking place on Tuesday; and on two different occasions, as I remember, after they had elected a Republican President, within a week after the election, there were strikes against reduction of wages.

Mr. SIMS. On account of what?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, on account of the fact that the election was over. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] They did not need them again for four long years, and by that time a high percentage of them would be replaced by workers from other lands and other climes. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, gentlemen, I cut out of the New York World a clipping sometime ago, when gentlemen were discussing generally the operations of the Steel Trust and when that organization was being lauded throughout the country on account of the way it treated its men. That clipping stated that at that time the steel strikers numbered 20,000 and were rapidly organizing. A reading of the body of the clipping shows that these men were striking for 15 cents an hour, for a 10-hour day, 6 days to constitute a week's work. Now, you know what the average ad valorem protection is upon steel. I sat in the Ways and Means Committee room when the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and heard Mr. Miles, of Wisconsin, beg that committee to put his product upon the free list if they had to, in order that he might get free raw materials and extend his business to all the four quarters of the earth. He said that at that time not only had the Steel Trust control of the steel situation, not only had they control of the wages of the workingmen, but that they had control of the manufacturers of this country; and he said: "Gentlemen, in the name of God, take the fingers of this Steel Trust from my throat, so that my children and my children's children may not be compelled to be their servants." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As I recollect the figures—I do not pretend to state them accurately—he then said he was compelled to pay $1.40 a hundred for steel billets laid down in Pittsburg, like those which the German manufacturer could buy laid down in Antwerp for $1 a hundred. If that is not substantially correct, I trust the gentleman from New York will correct me. I do not pretend to quote the figures with absolute accuracy, but that is my recollection.

Mr. PAYNE. I recollect very well that when the proposition was made to put agricultural implements, which Mr. Miles made, upon the free list, he came around and objected most strenuously.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes; I know. I will say that the statement which I have made will not be found in the printed hearings. You will find, if you examine it, that Mr. Miles's statement, as contained in the printed hearings, does not contain any such statement as that which I have made upon the floor.

Mr. MANN. That could only be because Mr. Miles himself took it out.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, certainly; I understand that.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Miles had the freest opportunity to revise his statement, and to put in anything that he wanted to, and to take out anything that he wanted to.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I understand that.

Mr. MANN. Was not that a sort of fraud upon the committee? I think we are agreed about Mr. Miles.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. With reference to the price of steel billets in Pittsburg and Germany, was the statement of Mr. Miles correctly quoted by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not recall his statement as to the exact difference.

Mr. GARNER. But there was a difference?

Mr. PAYNE. But I know that the committee made a very substantial cut.

Mr. GARNER. Was there a difference in favor of the steel billets in Germany as against the Pittsburg mills?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not recollect what Mr. Miles said about that.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not think the gentleman quite understands me.

Mr. PAYNE. As you will recollect, we had accurate information before the committee as to the cost of steel billets in this country and in Germany.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I did not intend to say, and I think the gentleman from Texas thought I said, that the Steel Trust was selling at one price in Pittsburg and at another price in Germany. That was not my statement. They may have been doing that, and I understand they were doing that very thing at that time; but the point I was trying to make was that the German manufacturer of steel laid down steel billets at Antwerp at $1, and the Steel Trust laid down steel billets at Pittsburg at $1.40, being enabled to charge that much more by reason of the tariff.

Now, why was that difference allowed? That 40 cents a hundred was given to the Steel Trust in order that it might pay living wages to American workingmen and enable them to clothe and feed their families and bring them up according to American standards. That is what it was given to them for. Now, what did they do with it? We find 20,000 men on a strike so that they might get $1.50 for 10 hours a day, and 6 days to constitue a week's work. We found afterwards in that great State of Pennsylvania, in this very strike, men were working as high as 17 hours a day and 7 days in a week. The Pittsburg Survey, which the gentleman from Wisconsin referred to, showed that the conditions in the city of Pittsburg were such that the men's wages were based on the ability of a single man in lodgings to live, and that once a man was hampered by a single dependent, a wife or a child, he must begin to go down to the slough of despond, where he belongs who spends every day more than he can earn. That is the situation that the Pittsburg Survey found in the highly protected State of Pennsylvania.

If you want to be friendly to the American laborer, as I stated before, instead of passing high-tariff legislation, which he has not asked for, give him the legislation that he is clamoring for.

Mr. MANN. Why do you not do it? You have control of the House.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. But we have not control of the other body.

Mr. MANN. Why do you not do it now?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. This minute?

Mr. MANN. Yes; instead of tariff legislation, why do you not pass their bill?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. In order to relieve the mind of the gentleman from Illinois, and I know he is wrought up over it, I will say that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. CLAYTON] has introduced a bill, and in the fullness of time I have no doubt it will be reported favorably to the House, which divides contumacious conduct into direct and indirect contempt of court, and strikes out of the hands of the employer of labor one of the weapons they have heretofore used for oppressing and plundering the men who work for them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that there are thousands of bills introduced in the House.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. But this bill will be reported, and I have no doubt will pass.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman from Illinois vote for it when it comes before the House?

Mr. MANN. I will determine that question when it comes before the House.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Illinois will knock out a comma here and a period there, and finally vote for the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it will take a grammarian to perfect it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would rather have the scrutiny of the gentleman from Illinois than not because I am very anxious that it should be a good bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been in the House some time, and I have got over referring to myself as a new Member. [Laughter.] I notice that when gentlemen on that side of the House are considering the trust question they are very much afraid that they are going to do something detrimental to the workingman, and when they are considering the workingman they are very much afraid they are going to hurt the trusts. [Laughter and applause.]

The American workingman, after all, only asks for a square deal. He asks that this country be kept abreast, as far as legislation is concerned, with other great nations of the world. It is enough to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of any man who is proud of this country to know that it is practically now a crime for an organization, the members of which are engaged in producing a product that may become the subject of interstate commerce, or are engaged in interstate commerce itself, to strike. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind—and I have been engaged in many injunction suits and have defended labor men against the charge of conspiracy—I say there is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that a strike of trainmen on a railroad engaged in interstate commerce is a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. That should not be. There is nobody on this side of the House, and I believe a very negligible number on either side, who does not think that that situation should be remedied.

In England, as soon as the first intimation was received that the courts intended to hold that an organization of labor, acting within the purposes of its organization, going upon a strike and doing anything lawful and peaceable to make the strike successful—as soon as Parliament found that the courts would decide that that might be unlawful, they immediately passed a bill distinguishing organizations of labor from all other organizations and making it lawful for them to do what it might be unlawful for other organizations to do. That is in England, where they do not pretend to have established a fiscal policy solely for the benefit of the laboring man.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Has the gentleman heard that the first labor injunction issued by a court in this country was based upon an English decision to cure and prevent the repetition of which the English statute was passed?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes; I am familiar with that. I am familiar with the fact also that this anti-injunction question, which is a burning issue—I do not know whether you gentlemen are all aware of it or not—which is a burning issue in this country, has been settled in England, and surely we ought to be able to keep fairly abreast of that nation. We are so fond of pointing to her, making her the background upon which to show up our own superiority in every way, that it seems to me we ought to make an honest effort at least to give the American workingman the same chance to fight for his life and the life of his little ones that England gives the English workingman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the Westmoreland mining district there is a strike on at the present time, and the first thing that mine operator did, as is usually done in all such cases, was to get control of the local criminal machinery—the local judge, whom we must not recall; the prosecuting attorney; the sheriff—all the machinery for the operation of the criminal law was seized at once. All of those officers, perhaps, were put in office by the manufacturer or the coal operator, and in Westmoreland we have that situation. We had these men down here before the Committee on Rules begging that an investigation be held.

Testimony was given to show that these men went on strike, and that immediately, in pursuance to the usual custom, an injunction was issued against them and they were forbidden to meet. When they did meet the sheriff's deputies, men sworn in by the sheriff and paid by the coal miners, shot them down, and 20 of those striking miners were killed during the year and a half that this strike has lasted. Why, you talk about Russia! Does any man here dare to say that that could happen in any civilized country in the world except this? And it could not happen here but for the one thing, as one of these men said in the hearings, that these are a lot of poor, ignorant foreigners, who were brought over to drive down the wages of the American workingmen; and they have no idea of their own rights, no influence, and receive little or no sympathy from the people in the surrounding community. Those things are the things that drive the wages down. That is the situation that prevents the American laboring man from getting his share of that which you so lavishly dispense to the manufacturer; and I hope we will do one of two things: I hope we will either shield the American laboring man from this influx of immigration to an extent that is practicable, because I am no extremist in that regard, or else that we will relieve him, on the other hand, from the oppressions of the monopolies which charge him extortionate prices for that which he must have.

Mr. Chairman, in closing I will say that I think this is a good bill. I think it is a step in the right direction. I am one of those who, if we had power, would not rush hastily into a reckless revision of tariff schedules. I do not know that I ever heard any other man in this House say that he was in favor of a schedule-by-schedule revision before I said so. Two years ago, speaking on the Payne law, I took that position—that schedule-by-schedule revision was the way to handle this tariff question—because I do not believe any party ever was elected or will be elected that is powerful enough to meet the combined interests that are represented in all these tariff schedules. You can see the fight that the Woolen Trust is able to put up now on this one.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman from New Jersey has just stated that this is a step in the right direction. Can he inform the House what, in his opinion, will be the last step in this direction?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. No; it all depends upon circumstances.

Mr. WEEKS. How soon will the next step be taken?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, the gentleman is not asking his question in good faith?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I am.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Well, I do not know. I would advise the gentleman to consult a clairvoyant. [Laughter.] I am neither the prophet nor the son of a prophet.

Mr. WEEKS. I am doing the next best thing, consulting a Representative on the Democratic side of the House who is talking.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, we have 226 men over here, and at least 225 bosses, so you will have to go elsewhere for your information.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman speaks of only one who is not a boss, and I am sure it is not the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Oh, I am a mild-mannered man, as the gentleman from Illinois knows.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that the gentleman from Illinois does not like this bill, but then he did not like the Payne bill. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] In fact, from what I know of the gentleman from Illinois in matters of legislation, I have come to the conclusion he is rather hard to please. But, whether this bill is a good bill or a bad bill, one thing I do know, and that is that it is different from the Payne bill. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And so far as I am concerned, and so far as the balance of my colleagues on this side of the aisle are concerned, we are satisfied to go to the country calm and confident in the assurance that it is vastly different from the Payne bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BROWN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11019) and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I submitted some observations on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] this afternoon and I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire in my remarks to incorporate some statements in reference to the pensions of soldiers as conducted in that institution and a few other little statements of that kind, and I would like permission to extend them in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, June 16, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

Joint resolution (J. Res. 120, A) memorializing Congress to cause all dams owned by the United States and maintained in and across the Fox River to be equipped with fishways.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 238) to authorize the extension of Lamont Street NW., in the District of Columbia, and I submit a report (No. 69) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session, and it is very important that it should be presently acted upon on account of the condition now prevailing of property there as to improvements.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2224) to amend "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910, to report it favorably without amendment and I submit a report (No. 70) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 and section 7 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910, be, and they are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That from and after the date of approval of this act no combustible or nonfireproof building in the District of Columbia used or occupied or intended to be used or occupied as a dwelling, flat, apartment house, tenement, lodging or boarding house, hospital, dormitory, or for any similar purpose shall be erected, altered, or raised to a height of more than four stories, or more than 55 feet in height above the sidewalk, and no combustible or nonfireproof building shall be converted to any of the uses aforesaid if it exceeds either of said limits of height."

"SEC. 7. That for the purposes of this act the height of buildings shall be measured from the level of the sidewalk opposite the middle of the front of the building to the highest point of the roof. If the building has more than one front, the height shall be measured from the elevation of the sidewalk opposite the middle of the front that will permit of the greater height. No parapet walls shall extend above the limit of height except on nonfireproof dwellings where a parapet wall or balustrade of a height not exceeding 4 feet will be permitted above the limit of height of building permitted under this act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to ask for some information of the proponent of the measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, all there is about this bill is that it extends the height 5 feet. It has been ascertained by architects that a four-story building can not be constructed in the best form, so far as the upper story is concerned, at the height of 50 feet, which is now the law. It is recommended by the architects and by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that the height should be extended to 55 feet, which it is argued can do no harm. Indeed, before the law governing the height of buildings was passed there were buildings on the residence streets constructed even higher than 55 feet. We have to-day in construction at least two buildings which it will be impossible to construct satisfactorily, so far as the upper story is concerned, unless this change is made in the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. My attention was not directed to the limitation of the height, because I think that is very proper, but I did not hear enumerated among the buildings business blocks.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill does not deal with business blocks at all. It simply deals with residence streets. There is some verbiage in it which is simply a repetition of existing law. The only change in the law is to give a right to construct buildings to a height of 55 feet in place of 50 feet, as is now provided.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have had in mind and I have frequently been called upon to notice the effect that the construction of a very tall business block right in a residence section of the city to a large extent depreciates the value of the residences. I have in mind a group of buildings that were built within a very recent time, some of them now under construction, that will entirely shut off the view of a large number of residences of importance and of great value.

It seems to me if we are going to place a limitation upon the height of buildings it should not apply alone to those buildings within the residential district. Senators will readily recall one building that is being constructed adjoining residences that have been there for a long time and that are the homes of people who do not desire to move or to see any conditions brought about that would compel them to move their place of residence. I think that the limitation should include business blocks.

I like to see the city improve, and I would not favor for a moment any legislation that would retard the building up of the city and the building of business blocks. But if you are going to place a limit in the residential districts you should also place a limit in the business blocks, because it must be in the interest of the residents of the city. This limitation is placed upon one class of buildings, and it must be against the interest of the people of this city that it is not placed upon other classes. A large residential system has been practically blocked out so that there is no hope of ever again enjoying a view greater than across the street. While this bill is being considered, it is a good time to make it sufficiently comprehensive to cover that condition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we have a law now which is very explicit governing the construction of all kinds of buildings in the District of Columbia. It may be that the limitation is too great. I am not going to argue that to-day. It was thought wise when the law was enacted.

I deprecate these high buildings as much as the Senator from Idaho does. I dislike exceedingly to see the skyline destroyed in the city of Washington. Yet it was thought desirable to pass the law which is now on the statute book, which the Senator can refer to and which will properly be a subject of discussion later on. But for the present I apprehend the law is not being violated in any respect.

The fact is, Mr. President, that business can not be halted in any city of the United States. Business has invaded Connecticut Avenue and is driving out the residents between H Street and Dupont Circle, and it is inevitable. I know they have not wanted to give up their homes; they were beautiful homes; but just as Fifth Avenue was invaded in New York by business houses and those who owned beautiful homes on that magnificent avenue had to surrender them just so it is in the city of Washington. Only a few years ago G Street and H Street were streets of residences, but to-day they are business streets; and, while there may be some hardships inflicted by the construction of these business blocks, I have never discovered that there is any way to stop the invasion of a street in any city by business enterprises, and I do not believe we can do it in Washington. That is my judgment.

But as to the height of the buildings, that of course is a matter for consideration and discussion, and if the present law permits them to be built higher than they ought to be, of course the law might be amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I had in view, among other sections of the city, the one referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. The value of residence property behind those tall structures has depreciated immensely. The fact is there is no longer a market for them for residential purposes. Some of the finest homes in the most desirable sections of the city have been practically destroyed for the purposes of residences within the last six or seven years.

I know of no reason why business can not spread over the ground the same as residences. In the great cities of the world outside of this country of ours the height of business buildings is restricted as is the height of residences, and if it can be made to work without hardship there it can here.

My sympathies are very much stronger for the residents of a city than for those who are engaged in making money off of the residents. Business enterprises are necessary, and business buildings should be encouraged, but not to the destruction of residences.

You see the effect of it. It is driving residents out into a new country, farther and farther all the time from the business centers and from that which is above all else the center of this city—the Capitol and the White House and the Government institutions.

I would not have the limit greater for business than for residences, and there is no reason why a business block should flaunt itself in front of your door and shut out your sunlight. The resident is entitled to the first consideration. This is a city, a capital city, of residences.

While it is true that this only applies to the residences of the city, yet it might be just as well, while we have the matter up for consideration and are in a humor to consider it, to see if we can not curb this evil of constructing six, eight, or nine story buildings all along one side of a street, leaving the residences on the other side to depreciate in value and lose all of their attractiveness. I should like to see it taken up as a part of this bill in the nature of an amendment. I am not going to stand in the way of the passage of this bill, because I am in sympathy with it, but I do think that it would be a good time to place some curb upon the building of tall business blocks.

They are generally built for advertising purposes; if not, they are built for the purpose of economizing the cost of the land upon which they are placed.

I have been for some time chafing under the conditions as I see them, one after the other. A few years ago I settled down to reside during my term here, and I could then look out and see the Capitol; I could see the Post-office Building and the clock on it; I could see all the buildings around us. One after one great tall and obtrusive buildings have gone up until to-day the residences are practically shut off. That affects the value. A man has a right to the view that naturally belongs to his residence, and not only that but a more important consideration is the effect it has upon the property of other people. While I will not ask the Senator to do so, I should like if he would incorporate or delay until some one can incorporate in this measure a restriction upon the height of these buildings.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not halt the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not going to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be very glad to take up the matter in which the Senator is so deeply interested, and if we think it wise to amend the existing law it can be done later on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATERS OF THE NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. BURTON. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with divers amendments, and I submit a report (No. 77) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes," approved June 29, 1906, and extended by joint resolution (Public Res. No. 56) for a period of two years, approved March 3, 1909, will expire by limitation June 29, 1911; and

Whereas the extended date provided therein for the termination of the operation of said act was so extended that there might be consummated a more permanent settlement of the questions involved by a treaty with Great Britain and by further legislation appropriate to the situation; and

Whereas article 5 of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, proclaimed May 13, 1910, provides a maximum limit within which the United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the State of New York of the waters of the Niagara River above the Falls of Niagara for power purposes: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the aforesaid act be, and they are hereby, extended from June 29, 1911, being the date of the expiration of the operation of said act, to remain in full force and virtue during the life of the said treaty, save in so far as any portion thereof may be found inapplicable or already complied with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not think this joint resolution should be taken up under the present order of business. When the question therein involved was before the Senate on a former occasion it occupied some time. It is a large question. Then it only proposed to extend the time until this month. Now it is proposed to extend it until the end of the treaty.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, it is an extension for two years.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, that is the life of the treaty.

Mr. BURTON. Until June 29, 1913.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the end of the treaty, is it not?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have the joint resolution again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the committee to the joint resolution before the request for its present consideration is put.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the joint resolution on page 2, line 6, after the word "act," by striking out the remainder of the joint resolution and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for two years, or until June 29, 1913."

Mr. HEYBURN. I withdraw the objection, that amendment not having been stated when I made it.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I ask what is the measure before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asks the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the inquiry of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the Secretary again read the title of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the joint resolution by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) extending the operation of the act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULBERSON. By what committee is that joint resolution reported, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM. It is reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations; it has been considered by a subcommittee of that committee, and finally by the full committee, and is reported unanimously.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, let us devote a minute at least to the consideration of a measure of this magnitude. The fact that it was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations is, of course, persuasive, but not conclusive. My recollection of this question is that the objection to it, when it was before Congress the last time, was that the other powers were not in the meantime restrained as we were. It is a large question; it is a question, of course, that must primarily be dealt with, if we are going to derive any benefit from it, through the intervention of a treaty, but we want to see to it that the terms of that treaty give an equal measure of rights and at the same time preserve the principle upon which we have acted in regard to the preservation of those Falls. We want equal rights to the use of the waters at the same time. We want those rights that are within the principle that has governed us in the past; and, in addition to that, the principle that we must recognize as essential for the preservation of those Falls.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not think the objections of the Senator from Idaho are applicable at all to this joint resolution. The treaty was made and finally ratified in the year 1910, but that does not prevent such regulations as are imposed by this joint resolution. These are a continuance of rules and regulations adopted in the year 1906. So far as equality is concerned, there is a difference in the amount of water that may be diverted on the Canadian side——

Mr. HEYBURN. A very large difference.

Mr. BURTON (continuing). And that which may be diverted on our side; but that is a matter of fact; it is included in the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It is a difference under the treaty, and not under the law.

Mr. BURTON. If anything, this tends toward equality rather than away from it.

Mr. LODGE. This checks it.

Mr. HEYBURN. We gave up more than we should have given up. We allowed the other party to the treaty to reserve rights which are in excess of the rights they gave to us under it. At the time of its consideration, these questions were raised and they were debated and considered. To bring the joint resolution up under the five-minute rule, or by unanimous consent, is hardly the proper thing.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the status of the joint resolution, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution has just been reported, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has asked unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the joint resolution will go to the calendar.

ESTATE OF JOHN POOL.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 69), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to the estate of John Pool, formerly a Senator from the State of North Carolina, the sum of $6,543.38, due him as a Senator of the United States in the Fortieth Congress, from the 4th of March, 1867, to the 24th of June, 1868, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. GAMBLE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 70), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,440 per annum.

IMPORT AND EXPORT TRADE WITH CANADA.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, some weeks ago I requested certain information from the Bureau of Trade Relations, State Department, in reference to exports and imports into Canada, the United States and Great Britain, and also a statement as to certain prices of agricultural products covered by the reciprocity agreement for the 20-year period, 1890–1909, inclusive. In reply to that request the bureau has sent me the information in the form of statistics. I ask unanimous consent that the matter be printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 49.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS FOR MONTANA AND IDAHO.

Mr. DIXON. I inquire, Mr. President, is the calendar to be called this morning? If not, I should like to ask unanimous consent——

The VICE PRESIDENT. When that order is reached the Chair will announce that the calendar is in order.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask unanimous consent to have Senate bill 2532 considered at this time. It is a short bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2532) providing for an increase of salary for the collector of customs for the district of Montana and Idaho.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask for a brief explanation why this particular increase in salary is considered necessary.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Mississippi has made the inquiry, for I know many times bills of this character are called up and passed without a word of explanation, and sometimes, apparently, an impression is left that something has been done surreptitiously.

The collector of customs for Montana and Idaho at Great Falls is the most important Federal officer in the Northwest, especially in those two States. Through the Great Falls customhouse all of the trade with northwestern Canada comes into the United States. The amount of customs duties collected there will average six or seven hundred thousand dollars per annum.

Until a year ago officers of this character, except at a few of the seaports, were on a commission basis, under an arrangement, I think, dating back to 1812 or 1813. The compensation of the collector heretofore has been about $4,500 a year, based on fees and commissions. Two years ago two smelters, one in Idaho and one in Montana, went out of business. Those smelters carried each a bonded warehouse, and, under the law, each of those smelters paid the collector a thousand dollars per annum. The dismantling of these two individual bonded warehouses, although the same work is done through other warehouses, chopped off $2,000 a year from the collector's compensation, which for 30 years had been about $4,500.

The bill was introduced last session and passed the Senate. It received favorable consideration in the House committee, but was not passed by the House of Representatives on account of the crowded condition of the calendar. The Secretary of the Treasury last session and at this time has strongly recommended that the collector's salary be made $4,000, instead of being continued under the old fee and commission basis. There is a unanimous report from the committee and a very strong letter from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending the passage of the bill. It merely puts this office on a basis with offices of similar character throughout the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what did the fees and salary heretofore paid aggregate?

Mr. DIXON. About $4,500 per annum.

Mr. REED. And did that include the $2,000 that was received from the smelters?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. REED. So that the fees now would amount to about $2,500?

Mr. DIXON. About $2,500.

Mr. REED. And this means a raise of $1,500.

Mr. DIXON. It is really restoring the old compensation, although the salary proposed is about $500 less than under the old fee and commission basis for 30 years. As I have said, it is the most important port of entry in the entire Northwest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That hereafter the salary of the collector of customs for the district of Montana and Idaho shall be $4,000 per year in lieu of the present salary and all fees, commissions, and perquisites of every nature allowed or permitted under the provisions of section 2648 of the Revised Statutes or other existing laws.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE POSTAL SYSTEM.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some days ago a report was made by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate upon a resolution (S. Res. 56) submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE]. At that time I asked that it go to the calendar so that I might examine it. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that resolution, being order of business 49. I desire to offer two or three amendments to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hamsphire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BOURNE on the 1st instant and reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate on the 7th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to inquire into and report to the Senate at the earliest date practicable what changes are necessary or desirable in the postal system of the United States or in laws relating to the postal service, and particularly with reference to the establishment of a parcels post, and for this purpose they are authorized to sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress, at such times and places as they may deem desirable or practicable; to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to conduct hearings, and have reports of same printed for use, and to employ such clerks, experts, counsel, stenographers, messengers, and other assistants as shall be necessary, and any expense in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the resolution—and I will say that the amendments I now propose to offer are agreeable to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE]—by striking out the words, on page 1, line 13, "experts, counsel," and in line 14 by striking out the word "messengers."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 13, after the word "clerks," it is proposed to strike out the words "experts, counsel," and in line 14, after the word "stenographers," to strike out the word "messengers."

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I favor the resolution for investigation of post-office matters as amended, and hope it may pass unanimously.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has passed.

Mr. WARREN. But I want to say at this time that I think we are sorely in need of information from a great many quarters. We seem to have been in a mad rush for some years for information. The Senate and the House of Representatives—the Congress of the United States—have had investigating committees galore, and have spent thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars in investigations and reinvestigations. The Senate has committees for the examination of every one of the departments of this Government. The House has similar committees, and the House is now engaged in pursuing investigations on special subjects through a large number of special committees. Indeed, the call for information has been so insistent that we have provided for a Tariff Board, for which we appropriated $250,000 a year ago; and in the last sundry civil bill we appropriated an additional $225,000, making $475,000 for the Tariff Board. They were called upon by the action of Congress and the Executive to make certain investigations at an early date. They examined into the pulp and paper business, and we have the result of that examination before us in their report, and we have the wish and interest of others in the reciprocity bill, so called. We have advices from that board that, as per instructions, they have investigated the wood-pulp and paper industries, and are now investigating Schedule K; that they have been at work on the wool and woolen industries for sometime, and that they will not be able to report probably until next autumn.

But, Mr. President, in this mad rush for legislation we find that there are great bodies and great men in a legislative body who believe that they know more about Schedule K than the Tariff Board does or ever will know, and they are going along with Schedule K, the Tariff Board notwithstanding. We can now see in the volume I have in hand—the official report of the House committee, accompanying House bill 11019, concerning the wool tariff—the result of some of this work on Schedule K, which relates to wool, sheep, and woolens. This schedule embraces one of the oldest industries of this country—one that has been under discussion, back and forth, for more than a hundred years, and one probably in which more men are engaged or have been engaged, together with all of its branches, than in any other known industry. And it is well that men in high places feel so sure that they know all about this industry that they do not need to refer to or wait for a Tariff Board's report for information or advice.

Mr. President, we have before us a public document. It is the report of a great committee of a great legislative body, the ultima Thule, as you may say, of this 100 years of experience concerning sheep and wool; and it is complete. It goes into the dictionary business—in fact, it is a dictionary. It contains a glossary, explaining the technical terms, and it shows plainly that there is in the minds of some people no need of a Tariff Board or of any investigation or further information. Of course we have to admit in reading this——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to know if the Senator from Wyoming thinks all the definitions contained in the report were taken from the dictionary?

Mr. WARREN. I have before me the Underwood glossary, something more recent than the dictionary, more ably edited than the dictionary, in which more able people are interested; and they have given us definitions which are evidently intended to be final. I do not believe that these definitions will add very much to the hilarity of the sheep growers and the farmers who have been struggling along under the fear of free wool and selling their wool for one-half or two-thirds price for the last year. I do not think it will make them very happy to read the definitions and to find that at one fell swoop all of the sheep of the United States have been unsexed after their first year's shearing, and that thereafter, no matter what they were at birth, they become members of the male sex—all of the sheep of the world, in fact, according to this glossary.

I do not anticipate that it will add even to the pleasure of the ancient ewe sheep that have every year borne their lambs, sometimes one at a time, sometimes twins, and sometimes triplets, to find that they are now wether sheep, male sheep, because they have passed beyond their first year, for here we have it [reading from House Report No. 45]:

Wether.—A sheep after the first shearing.

Wether wool applies to all fleeces cut subsequent to the first fleece, which is called lamb's wool.

What need have we for information, or, indeed, do we need so much information as we now have? Or is it a case where we have always been wrong, and hence we must commence again at the very beginning and learn the fundamentals?

Mr. President, it seems to me——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I ask my colleague from what he is reading?

Mr. WARREN. I am reading from Report No. 45, House of Representatives, Sixty-second Congress, first session, entitled "To reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool—Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submits the following report, to accompany H. R. 11019."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is the Senator satisfied with that definition of wether wool?

Mr. WARREN. Well, I am so well satisfied with it that I am not going to ask the proponents of this investigation of the Post Office Department to shear quite as close in the Post Office Department as these people propose to do in the case of a sheep.

Mr. President, either we need to go back to the very fundamentals, commence all over again, and investigate every industry and every branch of it, or else, as is assumed by the author of this report and others, there is nothing that can be added to their fund of information on Schedule K. When we assure the dear farmers that a lamb born a ewe becomes transfigured at her first shearing, and thenceforth remains a wether—a male sheep—it may add to the gayety of nations, but I fear the farmer will whistle and quote that old witticism, "It is better not to know so much than to know so much that isn't so."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator takes his seat, and leaves the subject of lamb's wool——

Mr. WARREN. There are a number of other items here that do credit to the text I have quoted.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call his attention to the definition of "lamb's wool."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What page is it?

Mr. SMOOT. This is page 229:

Lamb's wool is naturally pointed at the end, because it has never been clipped.

Mr. WARREN. And furthermore——

Mr. SMOOT. Here is a definition of "wool":

Wool.—Fibers of all animals are not alike; they vary in fineness, soundness, length, and strength, from the finest Merino to the rigid bristles of the wild boar.

Mr. WARREN. And, furthermore, a sheep is a hog until it is a year old, according to this glossary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator from Wyoming takes his seat——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has taken his seat. The Chair will ask him to resume a standing position.

Mr. REED. I wanted to inquire if it was his wether that was being shorn which had aroused his anxiety this morning?

Mr. WARREN. I am beginning to think that I do not know what a wether is. So I am unable to inform the Senator from Missouri. Certainly, if this glossary is correct, I have been many a long year groping in the darkness.

DECISIONS IN STANDARD OIL AND AMERICAN TOBACCO CASES.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have here a brief review by Mr. Walker, who has published a work on the history of the Sherman law. It is a review of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case and the Tobacco case, and I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. If that is the document which has been circulated pretty generally I think it ought to be read before it is printed as a Senate document.

Mr. NELSON. It is not that document, I will say to the Senator. It is a recent document; I have carefully read it and it is a fair and candid review of those decisions.

Mr. BORAH. The document starts out by designating the decision as the obiter dicta of the Chief Justice, and I for one am not willing, without further observation and looking into the matter, to consent to its being printed at this time, if I have a right to object, and the objection holds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator certainly has that right. The Senator from Idaho objects to its being printed as a public document.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand him to say that this document starts out by saying that the recent decisions—I suppose the "recent decisions" referred to are those in the Standard Oil case and the American Tobacco case—are obiter dicta?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Clerk please read the heading? I have seen one——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Sherman law; obiter dicta of Chief Justice White.

Mr. LODGE. I think it had better go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to its being printed as a public document.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that two short editorials from leading newspapers in Alabama, in reference to the election of Senators by the people, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request is granted.

The editorials are as follows:

THE PRICE DEMANDED IS TOO HIGH.

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser.]

The 47 States can now have United States Senators elected by popular votes, but to do so they must make to the Federal Government the greatest surrender of power since the formation of government. The chief power of the States in the affairs of the Federal Government has been exercised heretofore by the two United States Senators which each State sends to the highest lawmaking body in the world. If the legislatures of the various States ratify the action of the Senate taken Monday, these powerful officials will not only be selected by a direct vote, but they will be selected in elections over which the Federal Government will have supreme control, and for which it will prescribe rules and regulations.

The Southern States will stand firm with those southern Senators who declared that the price was too high to pay for the reform.

If the House of Representatives accepts the Bristow amendment to the bill providing for popular elections of United States Senators, and no doubt it will, the adoption of the required constitutional amendment will be fairly before the legislatures of the 47 United States. Three-fourths of the total number of these States will have to act approvingly upon the amendment before it can become effective. The Advertiser believes that the legislature of any Southern State would be foolish and reckless to buy the so-called reform of popular election of United States Senators at the price of Federal supervision. The proposed reform is prohibitively dear, if we have to buy it with our complaisant acceptance of the atrocious force bill, which a small band of devoted and courageous Senators defeated in the last generation when it appeared certain of enactment.

For nearly 50 years the compelling desire of the leaders of the Republican Party has been to seize the election machinery of the Southern States. They were successful in this for a short period, when, as Senator JOHNSTON of Alabama reminded the Senate, Federal soldiers stood about the polls in southern cities with drawn bayonets. "I have myself," said Senator JOHNSTON, "witnessed elections in my State where United States troops were assembled at the polls, and where supervisors and deputy marshals exercised potent influence. I never want to see either again. During the reconstruction period these officials were used for the most partisan purposes—to intimidate the voters and to prevent the full, fair, and free expression of the will of the voters."

Every man now living who passed through the trying and humiliating experience of reconstruction is one with Senator JOHNSTON—he never wants to see those distressing conditions restored in Alabama. Under the Bristow amendment the Federal Government will have the power to reestablish reconstruction conditions in the Southern States. When the Republican Party is in power the reestablishment of those conditions will depend entirely upon the will and inclinations of the partisan leaders of that party.

There is another phase to this question, which has been ignored by the light thinkers but loud talkers who have promised the coming of the political millennium with the election of United States Senators by a direct vote. The next step in the reform is that by which the United States Senators will be put upon a popular basis of representation. If Senators are to be elected by popular vote, the question will be asked, Why should the vote of one man in Nevada be equal to the vote of 50 men in New York? Is there any justice, it will be argued, in the claim that one voter in Arizona should be as powerful in naming a United States Senator as 30 men in Pennsylvania? The sincere advocate of the election of Senators by popular vote must be illogical when he argues that representation in the Senate must not be put upon a voting or population basis.

When we jump in the dark we sometimes jump downhill, and we have to keep on jumping. The man who thinks agitation affecting the Senate of the United States will end when the Senators are elected by a direct vote is foolishly blinding himself.

Looking at the question in a larger sense, with the light from the lamp of history thrown upon it, the United States Senate since the formation of our Government has been an abler, a more patriotic, and a more efficient body of lawmakers than the House of Representatives, the boast of which is that it was selected in a popular election and comes direct from the people. When the records of the two bodies are compared the higher credit does not go to the House of Representatives.

POPULAR ELECTION OF SENATORS VOTE.

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Register.]

Senators BANKHEAD and JOHNSTON of Alabama, BACON and TERRELL of Georgia, WILLIAMS and PERCY of Mississippi, FOSTER of Louisiana, and FLETCHER of Florida were the eight Democrats who voted against the resolution amending the Constitution to provide for the election of Senators by direct popular vote, their objection being to the Bristow amendment, giving to the Federal Government supervision of such election. Senator BACON had offered a resolution qualifying the Bristow amendment so as to prohibit Federal supervision unless the State legislators refuse or fail to act, and this was defeated by a vote of 46 to 42.

Sixteen Republicans joined with the eight Democrats in voting against the popular-election amendment—BRANDEGEE, BURNHAM, CRANE, DILLINGHAM, GALLINGER, HEYBURN, LIPPITT, LODGE, LORIMER, OLIVER, PAGE, PENROSE, RICHARDSON, ROOT, SMOOT, and WETMORE.

Senator JOHNSTON made the prediction that, with the Bristow amendment attached to it, the popular-election amendment will never receive the requisite indorsement of the States. It is probable that on this very account the majority voted for the Bristow amendment. There has been a very open declaration on the part of the Senators that popular election will not prove to be a good thing. Probably, therefore, these opponents of the theory of popular election insisted upon incorporating the Bristow amendment in order to keep popular election from becoming effective, even when adopted by the vote of the Senate.

Senator JOHNSTON'S prediction will come true, if the recollection of former days has not faded from the public mind. He said, when opposing the resolution because of the Bristow amendment:

"I have myself witnessed elections in my State where United States troops were assembled at the polls and where supervisors and deputy marshals were potential in the result. I never want to see either again. During the reconstruction period these officials were used for the most partisan purposes and to intimidate the voters and prevent the full and free and fair expression of the will of the voters. Such methods as that gave the party in power swarms of unscrupulous partisans, paid by the Government to carry out the will of the bosses, and they did not hesitate to abuse their power. These men were not chosen from the voters of the counties in which they acted, but imported from other cities and counties and States. Pretending to represent the authority of the United States, they really represented the bosses of the party in power."

The legislatures of the South are not likely to accept the amendment under the terms that it is offered. Fortunately, there is available the State primary, which meets the needs of the people in expressing their choice for Senators; so that no loss will be suffered if the amendment fails of confirmation.

REESTABLISHMENT OF ARMY DIVISION HEADQUARTERS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer a resolution and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 71) as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate its findings and recommendations upon the question presented in Senate document 42, involving the relative merits of divisional, as distinguished from departmental, headquarters in the military organization throughout the country, concerning which a controversy has existed for many years in the War Department, as is revealed by the letter from the Secretary of War, resulting in numerous changes from the divisional system of headquarters to the departmental system of headquarters and back again every few years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution because the matter is somewhat urgent. It develops from the letter presented by the Secretary of War in response to my resolution that the War Department during the last 90 years has operated in military affairs in the country about one-half of the time under the departmental system of headquarters, which now exists, under which there are at the present time, as I recall, nine military departments throughout the country, and during the other half of the time has operated the military affairs of the country, both tactically and in an administrative way through a system of divisional headquarters.

Mr. President, it is now proposed, by an order which has recently been issued, to make another change, on the 1st of July, back from the present system of departmental headquarters to the old and discarded system of divisional headquarters, and this will involve the transfer of a large number of officers and civilian employees from such departmental headquarters as St. Paul, San Antonio, Omaha, and other places, to either Chicago, New York, or San Francisco.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says "either." It is to those three.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; to one or the other of those three in each case.

Mr. BACON. Those are the three selected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Those have already been selected as the three.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If this were the first time that this change is called for, or if it had been known to have been made after any extended hearing before any legislative body, or if the experiment had never been tried before, it might be the proper thing to allow it to pass without any consideration, but the fact is that the present departmental system of headquarters has been in operation more than half the time during the last 90 years, as I recall. As is exhibited by this letter from the Secretary of War, this departmental system was installed again and the old divisional system was abolished in 1907, when the present President of the United States was then Secretary of War, and when Gen. Chaffee, an experienced Army officer, was Chief of Staff. It was discarded at that time, after it had been in use only four years—from 1903.

I think, Mr. President, that the time has come when the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate should at least have some hearings and make some investigation upon the relative merits of these two systems which have been tried from time to time and which have been abandoned and resumed and abandoned and resumed, each time at a considerable expense and each time with great disturbance to the organization throughout the country.

Now, I am frank to admit that I have a local interest. I happen to know that in my town, for instance, some 40 families will be required to move to Chicago or abandon their employment in the military service, and, as stated in this letter of the Secretary, they are in many cases old employees of the Government, entitled at least to fair treatment.

Mr. President, it is claimed that there are two reasons why this change should be made—first, that it will work for economy; second, that it will work for efficiency. I think, however, there ought to be a hearing before the Military Affairs Committee. I believe that the advocates in the War Department of the two systems—and there are in the War Department to-day, as I understand, advocates of the two systems—should be asked to come before the Senate committee and give their testimony and make their showing. Certainly at the time the Secretary of War, Mr. Proctor, made the change—I think in 1891—it was after quite an extended investigation, and certainly when the change to the present system was made, under the administration of Secretary of War Taft and of Gen. Chaffee, then Chief of Staff, it was entitled to considerable consideration; at least as much as it should be given at the present time.

I therefore ask that the Committee on Military Affairs, which, under the resolution introduced by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], already has the general power to hold hearings and take testimony, be given authority to investigate this question, and it should be done at once, before the order goes into effect. The investigation may at least result in some modification of the order, and I ask, therefore, that this resolution may be adopted.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I agree with the suggestions made by the Senator from Nebraska, and there are some other suggestions which I wish to make in that connection.

I admit in the beginning, as has the Senator from Nebraska, that I have a local interest in the matter. One of the headquarters of these departments is located in Atlanta, and all that he has said in a general way as to the effect upon these different localities will, of course, apply to this particular department.

There is another suggestion that I wish to make, Mr. President, and that is this: The burdens of this Government extend over every section of this country—properly so. Whatever of benefit there may be ought to be, as far as practicable, distributed with equal impartiality. Of course, the military establishment is a very expensive part of the Government.

The expenses of that establishment bear a very large proportion to the total expenditures of government. The expenditures necessarily are in a great degree found in the localities where the headquarters are. This new arrangement proposes that the nine departments—I think that is the number—shall be practically superseded by three headquarters, one of them in New York, one of them in Chicago, and one of them in San Francisco. There is a vast scope of country south of the line drawn between those three points that is practically excluded from all the benefits which arise from expenditures by reason of the requirements of the War Department.

I am not prepared to say, because I have not the information necessary for me to form a judgment satisfactory to myself, whether it is important that these nine departments should be broken up and the substitutes for them in other headquarters be limited to a smaller number, but I want to say in that regard two things. If they are to be limited to a small number they ought to be distributed with some regard to the geographical arrangement of those headquarters.

I say, Mr. President, in that vast range of country south of the line running from New York through Chicago to San Francisco there ought to be, in part, a representation in the establishment of headquarters in some parts of that country. I do not say it ought to be in Atlanta, I do not say it ought to be in New Orleans or Memphis, or at any other point that may be selected, but I wish to say that I think it is a discrimination not to be justified that all three headquarters selected for this great country, for the distribution practically of $100,000,000, should be limited to the upper line of the country and not be so arranged that these expenditures would in a natural way be found to be made impartially throughout the country.

If there are only three, one of them ought to be in the South. If it is essential that there should be three at the several points indicated, then there ought to be another created which ought to be in the South.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as presenting anything from a sectional standpoint. What I am presenting is to try to prevent that which is sectional. I do not want anything which is sectional. I am not asking that there shall be any preference shown to the vast extent of country known as the southern part of this country, embracing from a third to a half territorially of the entire country; but when that part of the country is discriminated against it is not sectional to ask that that discrimination be removed.

I wish to say with this disclamer of any purpose to do otherwise than attempt to affect that which would be impartial, that not only as to the War Department, but of any man will take up the appropriation bills he will find that outside of the appropriations for the Post Office Department, I can not state it with mathematical certainty, but I have not a doubt in the world that four dollars out of every five, if not nine dollars out of every ten appropriated by Congress, are expended in what we generally know as the Northern States, and not a fifth of it is expended in the Southern States, and possibly not a tenth of it. It may be that in some large degree that is unavoidable from the fact that a great many of the expenditures are for the procurement of things which are only manufactured at the North. The great shipbuilding industries are at the North, the great iron industries are largely at the North.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WARREN. It may be true, I say to the Senator, that the preponderance of money provided by some of the appropriation bills is more largely expended North than South. Of course it is a larger part of the country, taking it as a whole. But the Senator would hardly want that statement to stand as to the river and harbor bill or as to the Agriculture appropriation bill and others of that kind.

Mr. BACON. Those are very small bills.

Mr. WARREN. The river and harbor bill is a matter of $45,000,000 or $50,000,000 in itself, and the sundry civil bill carries still more for those improvements.

Mr. BACON. Not in a year.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will take up the sundry civil appropriation bills and see the amount that is appropriated every year for rivers and harbors he will find that the major part of the money expended in the sundry civil appropriation bill is for rivers and harbors in the Southern States.

I do not want to be sectional in any way, as the Senator knows, certainly not in appropriation questions. It never came up, as far as I know, in the consideration of an appropriation bill. It was my pleasure in the last appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department to stand a pretty long and severe strain in conference insisting that the full amount desired for the protection of cotton should be given.

Mr. BACON. How much?

Mr. WARREN. I do not recall what it was. I think we added some $300,000 or so to the amount already included in the bill.

Mr. BACON. A mere bagatelle compared with the thousand million spent every year.

Mr. WARREN. Then, taking the entire agricultural appropriation bill, the Senator, I know, does not want to be unjust——

Mr. BACON. No; and for that reason I am willing that the Senator shall go on as long as he wishes.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps I will wait until the Senator gets through the other branch.

Mr. BACON. No; I mean exactly what I say. The Senator can proceed.

Mr. WARREN. There is some misunderstanding about this distribution of troops, and there is no reason why the matter should not be examined into by the proper committee; and a foundation for that has been laid by the resolution which was introduced for information, the reply to which we now have printed. I have not had time to examine it closely.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. In reference to the river and harbor appropriations in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming, it may be observed that out of the 30,000 miles of navigable streams in the whole country 23,000 of them are in the South.

Mr. WARREN. That is true as to many another matter relatively. The occasion for this expenditure and the business calls for it were exactly the same as the calls for the improvement of the great rivers of the South. For instance, take the matter of public buildings and grounds. I do not believe there is a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who has ever served upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds who will claim that there has been any neglect of any portion of the South or that the percentage of improvement to the South has been any smaller than that to the North.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming entirely misconceives the spirit and intent of what I have said. I have not charged that Congress has discriminated against the South. On the contrary, when the learned Senator interrupted me I was about to say that in the nature of things, out of the existing conditions, unavoidably the larger portion of it was spent at the North. I was proceeding to say that in the matter of those things that relate to the expenditures of the Navy Department very largely they are necessarily at the North, because the ships are built at the North, the great steel plants are in the main at the North, and, necessarily, the expenditure is there.

I was speaking not in a way of criticism, but of a fact, and I repeat it as a fact, that if anyone will examine the appropriation bills and trace out where the money goes that is appropriated, not having examined it in a mathematical way by adding up the exact figures but by noticing the appropriation bills every year, I have no hesitation in the belief that, outside of the expenditures of the Post Office Department, which of themselves are returned by the revenues of the department, at least four out of every five dollars appropriated are spent at the North. I do not say that it was the design of Congress that that should be so, but I am speaking of the fact that it is so.

Then I say there are other things in which the expenditures are not necessarily limited to the North, and that where that is so we ought to be all the more careful that the expenditures should be impartially distributed, and that our arrangements of the different departments should be such that there would be an impartial distribution of the large appropriations which we have to make.

There are a great many things, possibly, that it is not necessary to buy exclusively at the North, and yet almost all of them are bought there. There are some few supplies that are bought in the South in the great expenditures in the construction of the Panama Canal, but the large bulk of them are bought at the North.

Therefore it is, Mr. President, if the purchase of Army supplies and the benefits which are to result from the location of headquarters in different localities are such that they are not necessarily limited to a section, the very fact that now there are conditions which require that the larger part of the appropriations should be spent in that section makes it all the more important that appropriations which are not relating to matters where the expenditures must unavoidably be at the North should be distributed, and that the South should get its full proportion of them.

That is the whole purpose, I say, Mr. President. I am not criticizing Congress in any manner; and I do not wish to be understood as criticizing the department in this matter, because I have no thought that that was the purpose of the arrangement. The fact is that the arrangement was made under the administration of a former Secretary of War, who was himself a southern man, Mr. Dickinson, the late Secretary. I know well enough his feeling with regard to the section from which he came to know that that was not his purpose; but I think that is the effect.

I want to say further that I am sure of another thing, and that is that the Secretary, whoever he may be, is not always responsible for these things. The heads of departments and various officials, military and civil, of course all have their combined influence, and out of their various suggestions these plans are evolved.

I am glad the Senator from Nebraska introduced this matter and brought it up, because while I did not know exactly in what shape to present it, I have had it in mind for the past few weeks to say something on this subject. As was said by the Senator from Nebraska, it is not limited to the small matter of the expenditure of money in the purchase of supplies, but it is the large expenditure of money which necessarily is made by those who are in the employment of the military branch of the Government. Forty families, he says, in his own community will have to be torn up and carried away to Chicago.

I believe that economy probably will result from a diminution of the number of these headquarters. Whether you call them divisional headquarters or departmental headquarters is a matter of indifference. I believe that some economy can be secured from the change. And I believe the number of officers possibly who are on detail at these various places can be decreased, and a number of them returned to their regiments. Therefore, I do not wish to be understood as being utterly opposed to any change, but I am most decidedly opposed to a change which seems to be utterly blind to the fact that the distribution of these various headquarters in different sections of the country, unless impartially made, must result in a partial distribution of whatever benefits may flow to the people of this country in the expenditure of this hundred million dollars.

Of course, I know what is said by the officers; they have said it to me. I have received from them an official communication to the effect that it is not thought it would make any material change in the places in which this money is expended. That is said by some, but an official communication which I have received from the Secretary of War on this subject is a little more guarded in the language. I can not quote it with absolute accuracy, but it goes on to say substantially that the expenditures will continue to be made in the future as they have in the past, as those expenditures may be made in one way or the other most advantageously. That will simply mean that the purchasing officers being in New York, Chicago, and San Francisco, those purchases can necessarily more advantageously be made altogether in sections contiguous to those three great centers, and that in the vast extent of country which I have mentioned, where supplies can be purchased just as economically, or more economically, not simply the South, but the great Southwest, and, in a degree, the Middle States, will be debarred from all participation in the benefits of the expenditure of this large amount of money, because the line running from New York to Chicago and from Chicago to San Francisco is, so far as it relates to the country between New York and Chicago, on our very northern boundary, and it is only deflected a little to the southwest as it proceeds to the west from Chicago to San Francisco.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that this matter will be submitted to the investigation of the committee, and that they will not only investigate the question suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, but that they will particularly investigate another question, and that is whether, if the number of these departments or divisions, whatever they may be called, is to be decreased, they should be limited to our extreme northern boundary or whether they should be distributed properly throughout the country.

Mr. WARREN. A number of these points that have been brought out by the Senator from Georgia will of course be examined by the committee. It is my understanding that all those depots named, established for the purchase of supplies, are to be maintained, and that bids will be received through them all.

But what I rose to say, Mr. President, is that this subject is a broad one, and I join the Senator from Nebraska in the desire to have the committee take it up. The Senator is a member of that committee, and so is his colleague, and I will ask him if it will not serve the purpose to refer the resolution to the committee that has already all the powers that this can give it, and I will be glad to join the Senator in asking for an early and complete investigation through the medium of that committee, or a subcommittee if it so chooses.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator from Wyoming takes his seat I want to understand him. Do I understand him to suggest that without the adoption of the resolution presented by the Senator from Nebraska he personally will favor this investigation under a general resolution which has heretofore been adopted by the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. Most assuredly, Mr. President. The usual resolution asking for liberty to sit in session or out, and for the employment of stenographers, and so forth, has been presented and passed relative to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I will join with the Senator from Nebraska in asking the chairman of that committee to call an early meeting and to have a full investigation.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let me ask the Senator what harm could then come in adopting this resolution? It simply——

Mr. WARREN. In the first place, it is absolutely unnecessary, and it carries more language than I think the proponent perhaps himself would, upon reflection, care to embed in the records.

Mr. BACON. I suggest that the resolution be read from the desk again that we may know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the resolution to the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 71) as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate its findings and recommendations upon the question presented in Senate Document No. 42, involving the relative merits of divisional, as distinguished from departmental, headquarters in the military organization throughout the country, concerning which a controversy has existed for many years in the War Department, as is revealed by the letter from the Secretary of War, resulting in numerous changes from the divisional system of headquarters to the departmental system of headquarters and back again every few years.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only want to ask a question for information from the Senator from Nebraska. Does the Senator understand that the proposition is to concentrate the Army at these three divisional points, or only to move the headquarters from the various departments to the divisional points?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understand that this does not involve the transfer of any troops; it permits the departments to still remain the headquarters for tactical purposes, but transfers the administrative work to the three divisional headquarters of the country. I should like to say, further, while I am on my feet, Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In order that the Senator may answer the entire matter at one time, I should like also to ask what information the Senator has as to the present status of the proposition? To what extent has the matter been developed by the War Department?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The order has been issued—I think it was dated in May—and it is to go into effect on the 1st of July.

I may say further that the letter of the Secretary of War reveals the fact that it is not proposed at the present time to dismiss any of the civilian employees, but to move them to divisional headquarters, and then to gradually diminish the number, as is hoped by the department.

Mr. President, while on my feet, I should like to say to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that I had some doubt whether the wording of the resolution which he had introduced early in the session empowering the Committee on Military Affairs to hold hearings and to make investigations was broad enough to cover this case, because it states that they may have the hearings upon any subject which may be pending before said committee. It seems to me there is no subject pending before the committee; there is nothing but this letter from the Secretary of War; but if this specific reference to the resolution were made to them, there would be no question about the propriety.

Furthermore, it seems to me, Mr. President, proper enough—if this widespread sentiment exists in the Senate, and I believe it does—for the Senate to express to the committee its desire for an investigation. I have not much doubt that the investigation will be had; but I can see no possible objection, if it is to be held, why it should not be under the specific authority of the Senate.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to this resolution being now referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but I shall certainly object to the consideration of the resolution for the purpose of bringing it to a vote to-day. The resolution contains recitals of facts that are not known to the Senate, and which I believe not to be correct. The Senate is not in a position to act upon this subject, even so far as this resolution goes; it has not the material before it on which to express any opinion, and it ought not to express any opinion.

I do not for a moment suggest that it would not be quite proper for the Senate, upon ascertained grounds and upon due consideration, to interfere with the conduct of the military affairs of the country, but the Senate ought not to interfere without ascertaining the facts and without due consideration upon the facts which it knows; but the recitals of this resolution take the Senate, it seems to me, much further than it should now go.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I merely suggest to the Senator from New York that the resolution seeks to put the Senate at an early date in possession of the facts just suggested by him, and it is necessary to proceed rapidly, or at least expeditiously, in view of the fact that the order will take effect on the 1st of July.

Mr. ROOT. But the resolution goes much further than merely calling for an investigation. Half of the resolution is taken up with statements of fact.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there are no statements of fact in the resolution except those taken from the letter of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ROOT. I have never seen the letter of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was presented to the Senate and has been printed.

Mr. ROOT. There are many papers which have been presented to the Senate which we do not carry in our minds.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want no misunderstanding about my attitude. I have no objection to the Senate directing the Committee on Military Affairs to take up the subject of a report to the Senate, but I do seriously object to asking a vote of the Senate upon what is said to be contained in some report—and I dare say that there is no misstatement made—but a kind of resolution that, without any premeditation on the part of the Senator, does in fact rather throw dirty water on the Army. It seems to me that a resolution directing the committee to make a report upon papers before it, called for by the resolution of the Senator, ought to be sufficient without advertising to the world, perhaps erroneously, that there is a contest of 100 years' standing in the Army. We can, of course, know nothing about it until we have examined the papers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Chair may be permitted to make a suggestion, the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution; and the Chair understands that there are two objections to its present consideration.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a moment more? I fear I shall be called out of town, and I know the chairman of the committee is likely not to be here to-morrow. I should be perfectly willing to have it disposed of so far as I am concerned, and I do not wish to object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If there is any language in the resolution objectionable—any language which seems to reflect upon the War Department—I should be perfectly willing to have it modified. What I want is an investigation by the committee.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I inquire what is Senate Document 42?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the letter of the Secretary of War which was sent here in response to my resolution of inquiry.

Mr. ROOT. Has the Senator from Nebraska any objection to striking out that part of the resolution which follows the word "country"—that is, striking out the words "concerning which a controversy has existed for many years in the War Department"? I do not think that is a correct statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My whole knowledge of this controversy is derived from this letter. It is because it contains the opinions of Gen. Chaffee——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Why not let the resolution go to the committee and let them examine it? We will then have not only the testimony of one general, but of several. I would favor the Senator's resolution if he would simply reduce it to directing that there shall be an examination of the matters contained in the report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is an objection, I think, to striking out that language, because the very reason for the investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs is the fact of the existence of a controversy in the War Department, as shown by the Secretary of War himself.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether or not he has a printed copy of the letter of the Secretary of War? I have made inquiry for it, but have been told that it is not yet in print.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is in print, but there is a delay on account of the map. I have a printed copy of the letter here, if the Senator would like to see it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to look at it. I made inquiry, but was told it is not yet in print.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I send a copy of the printed letter to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. This, then, is the letter in full?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir. There are bound copies, I may say to the Senator from New Hampshire, in addition to that.

Mr. ROOT. I can say to the Senate that between July, 1899, and the spring of 1904 there was no controversy in the War Department on this subject, and I do not understand that there is any controversy in the War Department now on this subject. There may be differences of opinion among individual officers, but I do not think the Senate ought to pass a resolution declaring that there is a controversy in the War Department, thus reflecting upon the discipline of that department. I have no objection to the proposed inquiry, but do not let us in advance of the inquiry make findings of facts that we know nothing about.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from New York kindly indicate just which words should be stricken out?

Mr. ROOT. I will read the words. If you leave in this language—

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate its findings and recommendations upon the question presented in Senate Document No. 42, involving the relative merits of divisional, as distinguished from departmental, headquarters in the military organization throughout the country—that is the effective part of it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ROOT. Let me complete my answer to the Senator from Nebraska, if you please. I suggest that you leave that language in and strike out the words which follow, and which are a mere recital, to wit:

concerning which a controversy has existed for many years in the War Department, as is revealed by the letter from the Secretary of War, resulting in numerous changes from the divisional system of headquarters to the departmental system of headquarters, and back again every few years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, I am willing to say, if that will satisfy those who object to the passage of the resolution, that I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to know whether the members of the committee to which this resolution will be referred understand that that language is sufficient to cover the scope of the particular inquiry to which I have directed attention, to wit, as to the propriety of the proposed geographical distribution of these headquarters? I do not desire to encumber the resolution with an amendment if it can be understood that that question is to be embraced in the inquiry.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not see how the inquiry can be made without covering that entire ground. That question would be revealed by the document itself, which, I will admit, I have not read; but it seems to me that an examination could not be made without involving that question.

Mr. BACON. Without involving the question as to the propriety of the geographical distribution?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. That being the case, Mr. President, I have no desire to encumber the resolution with an amendment, but I wish to say that the matter to which I have called attention is one about which I shall ask, either in connection with the investigation now called for or in connection with some other, that there shall be a proper investigation into that particular feature of the matter. I think it is an extremely—I started to use, probably, a stronger word than I should—I think it is an unjust thing to the different portions of this country that the location of these centers of influence from which distribution is made should be settled in a way entirely sectional. I think that, the burden being equally borne, the benefits should be as impartially enjoyed.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Mr. President, I hope the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] may receive favorable and immediate consideration. The State of Colorado is very much interested in the resolution. It is intended, so I am informed, that the Department of the Colorado shall also be abandoned. I hold in my hand letters of recent date from the Denver Chamber of Commerce, the Real Estate Exchange, and from many citizens protesting against the abandonment of the Department of the Colorado. It is for this reason that I should like to see the resolution now receive favorable consideration, and in view of the fact that the change is expected to be made on July 1, I should be glad to see the investigation carried on as promptly as possible. I see no harm in having the hearing at the present time, so that the matter may be thoroughly investigated and sifted without any possible delay. I ask for an impartial hearing by the Committee on Military Affairs, at which it will be demonstrated, in my humble judgment, that the State of Colorado, which I have the honor, in part, to represent, shall not be unjustly discriminated against, as now seems to be contemplated. I ask that the grievances of my many constituents be left to the Committee on Military Affairs for a prompt investigation, which I trust may be had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Nebraska, as the Chair understands, has modified his resolution in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the resolution as modified be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution as modified will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows (S. Res. 71):

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate its findings and recommendations upon the question presented in Senate Document No. 42, involving the relative merits of divisional, as distinguished from departmental, headquarters in the military organization throughout the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed, and the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The Secretary will state the first business on the calendar.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts, approved March 4, 1911.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will go over at the request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I was about to make the same request; but I wish to say further that I shall ask at a very early date that the joint resolution be taken up and disposed of.

The bill (S. 20) directing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding legal title of the United States to sublots Nos. 31, 32, and 33 of original lot No. 3, square No. 80, in the city of Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

EXTENSION OF UNDERWOOD STREET NW.

The bill (S. 23) to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW. was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the bill, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire offers a substitute for the bill, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within six months after the dedication, in accordance with law, of the land necessary to widen Underwood Street from its present western terminus west of Eighth Street west to Seventh Street west to its full width of 90 feet, as laid down on the permanent system of highways plan, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary to extend said Underwood Street from its present western terminus west of Eighth Street west to the Piney Branch Road, with a width of 90 feet, as laid down on the permanent system of highways plan: Provided, That if the dedication referred to herein shall have been made prior to the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to institute the condemnation provided for herein within six months after the passage of this act: Provided further, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceeding taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits, and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit some papers in addition to those already filed with that bill, which I ask shall accompany the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The papers will be received to accompany the bill.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, the objection of the Senator from Idaho to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HEYBURN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Culberson	Jones	Root
Bourne	Cullom	Kenyon	Shively
Bradley	Cummins	Kern	Simmons
Brandegee	Curtis	La Follette	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Dillingham	Lodge	Smoot
Brown	Dixon	McCumber	Swanson
Bryan	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Townsend
Burnham	Foster	Nelson	Warren
Burton	Gallinger	Nixon	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Gamble	Overman	Williams
Chilton	Guggenheim	Page	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Penrose
Crane	Johnson, Me.	Perkins
Crawford	Johnston, Ala.	Poindexter

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The Senator from Idaho asks for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask for the yeas and nays now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have just been refused.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. We have had a vote since then—viva voce.

Mr. HEYBURN. I raise the question of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair will put it again, but the Chair just this moment put it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do not think the Senate could have understood what was proposed to be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair will again put the question.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; Mr. President, I object. The yeas and nays having been refused to one Senator, under no rule of this Senate can they be ordered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not put the question again in the face of an objection.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I submit, but I give notice——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy or Marine Corps, and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I am very warmly in favor of the bill, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I think, has an amendment to offer to it. He is absent from the city, and I ask that the bill go over on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

KANSAS RIVER DAMS, IN KANSAS.

The bill (S. 1524) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River in western Shawnee County, or in Wabaunsee County, in the State of Kansas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "act," to insert "approved June 23, 1910, entitled 'An act to amend an act,'" so as to read:

That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the Topeka Commercial Club, organized under the laws of Kansas, its successors and assigns, to erect, construct, and maintain a dam or dams across the Kansas River at a suitable place or places in western Shawnee County, or in Wabaunsee County, in the State of Kansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,'" approved June 21, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 2117) to promote the efficiency of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

NORTH POINT LIGHT STATION, WIS.

The bill (S. 2052) relating to the expenditure of an appropriation for the razing of North Point Light Station, Wis., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "for," to strike out "razing" and insert "raising"; in line 8, after the word "location," to insert "provided such removal is, in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, for the best interests of the service"; and on page 2, line 3, after the word "granted," to insert the words "under the condition named," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $10,000, appropriated by the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 4, 1909, for raising North Point Light Station, Wis., is hereby made available for removing said light station to a site 3,000 feet northeast of its present location, provided such removal is, in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, for the best interests of the service; said new site to be secured for the United States from the city of Milwaukee, Wis., by an exchange of a portion of the present lighthouse site; and authority to make such exchange of sites is hereby granted under the condition named.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill relating to the removal of the North Point Light Station, Wis., to another site."

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] withdraws his objection to the consideration of the bill (S. 2117) to promote the efficiency of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. JONES. Yes; so far as I am concerned, I withdraw my objection to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection being withdrawn, the bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator who has the bill in charge, if there are any amendments he proposes to offer to the bill, or does he intend to try to have it passed as it is?

Mr. FLETCHER. No amendments are offered. The bill as it was introduced is reported favorably without amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to want the three surgeons on waiting orders and one passed assistant surgeon on waiting orders to receive the increased pay?

Mr. FLETCHER. No. As the report shows, on page 2, as to the three surgeons who are mentioned as receiving at present the compensation of $1,875, there will be no increase. In the case of the other passed assistant surgeon, receiving $1,500, there is no increase. It will remain the same as it is now.

Mr. SMOOT. I wondered whether the bill was explicit enough on that point, because if one of the senior surgeons, of which there are to be 10, according to the bill, was, for some cause or other, placed upon waiting orders, and he, in the meantime, had received his increased compensation as provided in the bill, would he not draw three-fourths of the increased pay which he would receive under the bill, which would make it, if he were a surgeon on waiting orders, $2,250 instead of $1,875?

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand he would receive three-fourths of the pay which he is receiving at the time he goes on waiting orders, whatever that may be, depending on his position at that time; but there would be no increase under this bill of any compensation, commutation, or otherwise for those who are at present on waiting orders.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from Florida in speaking of this matter to say that he intended to offer an amendment to the bill providing that whenever a surgeon was on waiting orders he was to receive $1,875 per annum instead of $2,250, and the passed assistant surgeons on waiting orders to receive $1,500 instead of $1,875 per annum. If the bill passes as it is, that will be the result on all those who are on waiting orders to-day, but if a surgeon is placed on waiting orders, which, in other words, simply means the retirement list, and he, through this bill, receives the increased pay, then he would receive three-fourths of the increased pay that he is receiving under the bill, would he not?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not understand that he would. In discussing the matter with the Senator, I suggested that an amendment might be proposed to cover the point which he mentioned. But upon investigation of the present law and the effect of this bill, I am sure it does not mean to give those on waiting orders the increase which the Senator supposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I am afraid the bill as it now reads would give that increase, and I really would like to have adopted an amendment providing that whenever a surgeon goes upon waiting orders, he should receive the salary of $1,875 per annum, and whenever a passed assistant surgeon is on waiting orders he should receive $1,500. Then there would be no question about it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I agree with the Senator from Utah that under this bill the compensation of the surgeons who are on waiting orders would be increased.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not, in my mind, any doubt about it; but, if the Senator will remember, in the committee the report that we received from the Surgeon General, which showed the increase both as to salary and commutation of quarters, did not provide any increase whatever for surgeons on waiting orders nor for passed assistant surgeons on waiting orders, and I did not insist upon my point. But after we adjourned and after I discovered this, I took up the matter with the Senator from Florida, and we thought that the bill ought to provide that hereafter surgeons upon waiting orders should receive $1,875 per annum and passed assistant surgeons $1,500 per annum; and I really believe that that was the thought of the committee when we ordered the bill reported out.

Mr. WORKS. I think the purpose of the committee was that their compensations should not be increased, but no such amendment was provided for; and if the Senator from Utah desires to reach that result, I think an amendment to that effect is necessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Upon an investigation of that matter I found that the statement submitted by the Surgeon General to the committee was erroneous in respect to the possible increase to those surgeons on waiting orders, and the statement found in the report is not exactly the statement that was submitted to the committee. The report, on page 2, shows the actual conditions that matters would be in if this bill is passed. Three surgeons would receive $1,875, and no more. The passed assistant surgeons——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] still has the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, I did not observe that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida desire to hold the floor?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the objection suggested by the Senator from Utah is really more apprehensive than founded upon any effect of the bill. I am quite sure the objection he urges could not be urged to the bill if it should become a law, and I should like to see the bill passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill could not now be passed because the unfinished business is before the Senate. The question is whether the Senator desires to retain the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well; I will let the bill go over then.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for the purpose of considering amendments, and that the committee amendment be considered first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, as to the order of procedure that is the rule as to appropriation bills. We have undertaken to apply that rule once or twice to other measures of legislation and it did not work out well. I am speaking of what we can enforce. We can not enforce it, because there is no rule under which we can do it. If we undertake it in that way it will have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill is short. It does not make much difference, if the Senator from Idaho prefers to have the bill read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want to interfere. I merely want to call attention to the fact that it has proved a failure in the past as a method of considering legislative measures other than appropriation bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read in the usual order.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the bill be read in the usual order.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Crawford	Jones	Reed
Borah	Cullom	Kenyon	Root
Bourne	Cummins	Kern	Shively
Bradley	Curtis	La Follette	Smith, Mich
Brandegee	Dillingham	Lodge	Smoot
Bristow	Fletcher	McCumber	Swanson
Brown	Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Townsend
Bryan	Gamble	Martine, N. J.	Warren
Burnham	Guggenheim	Nixon	Wetmore
Burton	Heyburn	Owen	Works
Chilton	Hitchcock	Page
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Penrose
Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is absent attending a hearing and it is impossible for him to be present.

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the reading of the bill is commenced I wish to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill as to his information concerning the preparation of Senators to discuss the bill. There does not seem to be great enthusiasm manifested in that direction.

Mr. PENROSE. As far as I am advised, and I have made careful inquiry in the last two or three days, there are very few Senators who expect to speak in behalf of the measure, and those who expressed an intention to speak against it do not seem to have made much progress in the way of being prepared.

I am glad the Senator from New Hampshire has raised the question, because there ought to be some understanding as to the rapidity with which the consideration of the bill should be pressed. Either the Senate should fix a day to vote on the bill, in which case Senators can take their time, or else there ought to be some disposition shown to fill in the days as they pass by before we come to a vote on the measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I raised the question for the reason that Senators on both sides of the Chamber have suggested to me that they are not ready and will not be ready to-morrow to proceed with the discussion of the bill. Quite a number of Senators said to me that they are preparing speeches. Other Senators have said to me that they have important committee work to do to-morrow. The suggestion was made that we could, without detriment to the public service, adjourn over until Monday, and I will venture to make the motion now that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PENROSE. If I may be permitted——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. PENROSE. Before the motion is put, I will state that I am not advised that any Senator will be ready on Monday.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we ought to meet on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania correctly that there is no one willing to speak in behalf of this measure?

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that there are not as many desirous of speaking in behalf of the measure as there are those who desire to speak against it. The friends of the measure would be willing to vote this afternoon on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Without any debate?

Mr. PENROSE. Without any debate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that the disposition of the chairman of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. PENROSE. I will be willing to vote now on what has been before the country for six months and thoroughly discussed by both sides. Months have been taken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator think that both sides have been before the country?

Mr. PENROSE. To an extent, I think so, in the hearings before the committee, which occupied nearly a month, during which over a hundred persons were heard from all over the country, chiefly against the measure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it seems very strange that a measure which is calculated to bring into unrestricted competition the natural products of a foreign country larger than our own, and the surrender of revenues amounting to between four and five million dollars a year, should excite no controversy in this Chamber.

Has this measure no champion in the Senate, North or South, on either side of the aisle? Then, in the name of reason, why is it here, and why was it begotten?

I am surprised that Senators who have hitherto asserted the right to be heard upon legislation affecting the welfare of our countrymen should hesitate at this critical juncture and not be willing to come out into the open and discuss a measure so shorn of actual merit, a proposition that has been rejected again and again by the chief officers of this Government. This agreement is analogous in almost every detail to the one entered into between Great Britain and the United States in 1854 on behalf of Canada, and which the great Lincoln asked the Senate to repeal. Canada proposed this same measure to President Grant, and it was rejected as undesirable. It was urged again and again by Canada upon Harrison and Blaine, and rejected by these great statesmen as inimical to the welfare of the American people. Perhaps, after all, no one in the Chamber is willing to defend it in view of our past experience in this direction, an experience which met the prompt condemnation of the immortal Lincoln, and which has met with no public or official favor since that historic day in January, 1865, when the old agreement was repealed through the efforts of Chandler, Wade, Sherman, and other great leaders in the Senate.

This is a history-making forum, the record here made is indelible, and fidelity and faithfulness to our own countrymen will be the sole test which the future will apply to our course in this matter. We must not turn the deaf ear to the apprehensions of our own people; we must not refuse to be guided by their wisdom and past experience in this direction; the back of labor must not be broken for the wedding feast; the rich soil of our own country must not be despoiled for the purpose of adding luster to the crown of England.

Mr. President, I can understand why there should be no affirmative side to this question, when we are to give to the people of a foreign state all the rights of membership in the American Union, and permit them at the same time to be protected, defended, and controlled by one of the foremost powers in all the world.

Are we, Mr. President, to put aliens upon an equality with our own American citizens, without any power to tax them or to draft them into the service of our country in time of peril, without a reason being given for this extraordinary procedure and this unfair advantage over the people of our own land?

I am amazed that a proposition so radical should have been so seriously considered for weeks in the Committee on Finance and appear here without a favorable report or a word of enlightenment, and that now no one on the committee is willing to rise and defend it.

Mr. President, what are the privileges of American citizenship? To labor and toil, preparing the vineyard for the stranger who only comes to us at daybreak and again recrosses our border as the sun goes down? Have we no exclusive joys within the confines of our own land beyond the prying gaze of strangers whose only mission among us is to tear down and to destroy? The burdens of this Government have in times past been heavy and hard to bear; were we able to enlist our northern neighbors when the day of reckoning came? Did they assuage the anguish of broken hearts or bind up the exposed wounds; did they defend us on the field of battle alongside the farmer soldier whose interest is now in jeopardy; did they pay the debt incurred in the maintenance of the Union of States, the largest ever assumed by a free people? No! It fell upon the toiler in factory and field, and without complaining he has paid it ungrudgingly. We promised him this market for his wares, gave him certain assurance of this land for the exclusive exercise of his genius, and now, when the harvest is ripe, it is to be garnered by strangers and with our consent. I protest, Mr. President and Senators, against this arrangement. It is unfair and unjust to the people upon the American farm and not helpful to those in factory or mine; it is reciprocity only in name and degrades that wholesome principle into sharp practice and chicanery. Sir, I would feel unworthy to stand in this high place if I did not resent with all my vigor this assault upon the institutions of the State which sent me here.

Mr. President, I did not intend to make a speech at this time. I thought that we were to be enlightened by some great burst of wisdom that would shed a flood of light upon this vexatious problem. But, alas, all lights are out. The Chamber is in darkness, and no word is to be spoken; a fit setting indeed for the accomplishment of such a deed.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am amazed that we are to have no enlightenment from Senators who have had the exclusive custody of this measure for many weeks past.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. Has the Senator read the very able argument in favor of this measure made by the Republican President of the United States and by the Republican governor of Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have read both.

Mr. KERN. Have they not illuminated the subject? Have they shed no light?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In my opinion, Mr. President, the President of the United States has uttered many splendid thoughts; he has, with a power of analysis unsurpassed by many of his predecessors, been able to speak intelligently and instructively upon many public questions; but I am amazed, sir, that of all the things he has discussed, of all the wisdom he has uttered, of all the suggestions he has made, the only one that has found a warm welcome or a permanent lodgment in the brain of the distinguished Senator from Indiana and his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber is a measure so tinctured with Democracy that it finds no championship here in the party to which I belong.

Mr. President, I am going to discuss the bill later as thoroughly as my time and my strength will permit, but will not detain the Senate for that purpose at this time. Ordinarily, we consider the affirmative side of a proposition and then the negative, but we are not to have any discussion. It is to be taken blindly, without further thought, and those who are willing to do it are welcome to the responsibility which that course implies. But for myself I shall refuse to do it, and will, at an early day, give reasons which prompt my earnest opposition to this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the bill be read. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The bill was read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 3, after the word "board," it is proposed to insert:

and when the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that such wood pulp, paper and board, being the products of the United States, are admitted into Canada free of duty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to passing over the amendment? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BACON. What is the proposition, Mr. President? I did not hear it.

Mr. LODGE. I asked that the amendment be passed over for the present, because the author of the amendment is not yet ready to speak upon it.

Mr. BACON. What is the particular amendment?

Mr. LODGE. The only amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not suppose that that procedure, while strictly in order, would be in contemplation of the Senate, in view of the recent action in passing over the amendment. Of course, if we passed over the amendment, it would indicate that it would be left open and not that the bill would pass into the Senate. So far as I am concerned, I want to say that I am perfectly willing for it to proceed to the Senate and to be voted on to-day without further debate.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator knows, I followed the practice usual in the case of appropriation bills and asked that the amendment be passed over for the present. That is all I intended to do.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment can be considered in the Senate just as well as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator desires that, I have no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am not entirely familiar with the procedure of the Senate. I was out of the Chamber for the moment and am not informed as to what discussion has taken place so far, but I desire to state that I propose to offer an amendment to the bill providing that the President shall enter into negotiations with Canada for the purpose of enlarging reciprocal trade with Canada; and I am rising for the purpose of asking if I shall be foreclosed or estopped from doing that if the bill is reported to the Senate to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will not be foreclosed if he offers his amendment at any time before the bill is read the third time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has asked that the amendment reported by the committee go over, and couples that with the suggestion that the author of the amendment is not yet ready to proceed to its discussion, it would, I think, be manifestly improper—or, at least, it would be very unusual—to have the bill reported to the Senate. Therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 19, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, imbue us plenteously, we beseech Thee, with heavenly gifts, that we may be guided to a faithful and conscientious service to Thee and our fellow men here, now and always, in the spirit of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019), a bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and pending that motion I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] if we can come to an agreement about closing general debate and taking up the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I understand to some degree the position of the other side of the House with reference to next Monday and the order of business then, and it has been suggested to me by the gentleman from Alabama that if we could take a recess Saturday about adjournment time, of course occupying Saturday in general debate, until Monday at 11 o'clock, we could close general debate on this bill Monday, with the understanding we take it up on Tuesday under the five-minute rule. I told him, so far as I was concerned, I had no objection to that proposition. Of course, I can not speak for all gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Suppose you let the matter go over until we get ready to close to-night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well; then I will see if we can come to an agreement when the committee rises to-night.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope that will be about 5 o'clock; rise for that purpose, perhaps.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to run this afternoon until 6. There are a lot of gentlemen who desire to speak before we close debate.

Mr. PAYNE. Not later than 6; I will not object to it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the House bill 11019.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and woolen manufactures, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it is no great wonder that this bill has excited little interest either upon the floor of this House or in the press of the country. It has been found difficult to summon even a corporal's guard, as a rule, of Members in this House to listen to anyone. It has been almost impossible to find in any one of the great daily newspapers any mention whatever of what was said in the debate. Why, even this morning the account of the very able and eloquent speech that was made yesterday by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] ran as follows:

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey was the only speaker on the Democratic side.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With great pleasure.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How does the gentleman account for the press of the country being so passive in the face of a bill that is so fraught with destruction?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the very subject I am about to approach, if the gentleman will contain himself. Of course, the subject, as the gentleman from Missouri says, is of vast importance, and the speeches upon both sides have been very eloquent and the debate has been of a very high order. Under ordinary circumstances it would have provoked great and general interest, but the reason why it has not is not hard to find. It is because nothing that is said or can be said upon the floor of this House can in the slightest degree influence the form or the adoption of this measure. It is foreordained that it shall pass in exactly the same form that it is now before us. Now, this proceeding is exactly that in the celebrated case of "Alice in the looking-glass," where the prisoner was sentenced first and afterwards the evidence was introduced and the pleas made. We are told by the responsible leaders of the majority that not a comma in this bill can be changed because it has been resolved upon in caucus. The Democratic caucus is king of this House, and we are either its unwilling or its willing slaves. Everyone knows that any debate in this House so far as it may affect the form of this bill is utterly futile. A debate conducted in any school or college in this country would be equally effective. We will shortly be called upon to vote upon this measure, and that will be a purely perfunctory proceeding, except in so far as it will enable us to register for future reference our opinions of this bill.

Many of us on this side of the House will vote against this bill who do not sympathize with every provision of Schedule K as it now stands. And it is not to be considered that a vote against this bill is a vote to perpetuate forever all the provisions of Schedule K. It amounts only to a refusal on our part to plunge absolutely in the dark into a wholesale revision of this most intricate and important schedule with no more information than we now have. If we are to have a sincere and honest revision of this or any other schedule of the tariff—if it is our purpose to place the tariff upon a genuinely scientific basis, the proceeding that we are now engaged in—and I measure my words—is a mere farce.

Since the majority of the Ways and Means Committee proceeded with the formation of this bill they have not summoned a single witness. So far as we know they have not consulted a single expert. They have tapped no new source of information that this House has not had in its possession for at least two years. Under any other circumstances there might have been good excuse for this, but to-day we have a branch of the Government created for the purpose of acquiring and submitting to Congress the information which, all except, possibly, the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, concede we now lack—a board which is engaged in investigating the precise facts, to the ignorance of which this bill and the report that accompanies it bear such eloquent testimony.

Congress has created a Tariff Board. We have allotted to it certain functions. We have imposed upon it certain duties. We have appropriated for it money to carry out those functions, and yet we are here asked to ignore it absolutely, notwithstanding the fact that only a few months ago Congress instructed the Tariff Board to investigate the wool question and to report to the next regular session of Congress in December. Of what possible use can that report be to this House if we have already legislated in advance? Can any proceeding be more utterly futile?

Let us assume for the sake of argument that a necessity for a speedy revision of this schedule exists. Could any detriment result to the country from awaiting this report?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman from Ohio concedes, of course, that the so-called Tariff Board is proceeding to determine the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and that is the scope of their labors. Now, the gentleman knows that that is not the principle to which the Democratic Party has committed itself with respect to tariff revision.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not concede any such thing, Mr. Chairman. The Tariff Board is investigating to-day an infinite number of things that do not come under the definition of the gentleman from New York as merely the difference between the cost of production here and abroad.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. What are those things, if the gentleman can inform us?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, they are of such infinite detail that I could not really pause to enumerate them, Mr. Chairman. They deal with every condition of manufacture. They deal with the cost of producing wool in all its various stages; they deal with the shrinkage of wool in its various stages, and with all the conditions that now surround the wool business; not only the business of sheep raising but the manufacture of wool, and to acquire details of information which, as is very apparent from the report of the Ways and Means Committee, are absolutely necessary to bring the subject up to date.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. But, Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman adhere to that plank of the Republican platform which declares the proper way to revise the tariff is to fix the rates so as to cover the difference in the cost of production here and abroad and then add a reasonable profit to the manufacturer?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree that that is the proper definition of a tariff which is proposed for purely protective purposes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman adheres to that and ascertains the amount of difference in the cost of productions here and abroad, and confines himself to that only, what inducement is there to import anything into the United States, and how are we going to collect the proper amount of customs revenue?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is going into the question of reasonable profit for the manufacturer, and what it means, and all that.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; I will strike out that proposition as to the reasonable profit and, for the sake of argument, confine my question to the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and ask, How are you going to import anything and raise revenue if the duties imposed entirely offset that difference? Is not that a prohibitive tariff?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, we might raise the tariff 10 times beyond the mere difference in the cost of production in this country and abroad, and yet there would be an importation of wool, because, as conditions exist to-day, we can not produce enough wool. I want to see the tariff on wool fixed at a reasonable competitive point. I do not want to see any tariff placed so high that no importations can come in, but I do want to see it high enough to prevent the flooding of this market with the products of foreign labor and foreign capital.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I did not ask these questions for the purpose of embarrassing the gentleman from Ohio. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, the gentleman can not embarrass me by his questions, I can assure him. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. As to certain articles, if we should apply the Republican rule, would it not require a prohibitive tariff rate?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to state a fact which I think it is important for the House to know? The agents of the Tariff Board, as now constituted, are actually at work in the city of Philadelphia, visiting the woolen and worsted mills. They are inspecting the books of the companies. They are examining the classes of wool that enter into the manufacture of various garments, and they are also studying the question of the cost of production here and the relative cost of production abroad. In other words, to answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], through the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio, this board is now actually engaged, through its agents, in making a practical examination of the business of the manufacturers. That is the condition that prevails in my city at the present time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably their function is immensely greater than that of merely investigating the difference in the cost of production. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me for a few minutes, I am coming a little later to the point where I am going to try to show that the information which this committee have acquired and published in their report is information that was out of date over 50 years ago.

Mr. HARRISON of New York rose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I will come to that. That is the information upon which they are assuming to revise this most intricate schedule in the entire tariff.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, but, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will pardon me for a few minutes. I will yield to him later. The point I am making now is that even the strongest partisans of this bill, of whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], as I understand it, is not one—am I correct in that?—even its strongest supporters admit that by no conceivable combination of circumstances can this bill as it stands become a law before the 1st of next December. Could any harm result then from delay, even from their own standpoint—I do not want to discuss this matter in a purely partisan way—from the standpoint of the supporters of this bill?

Suppose that the information which will be furnished by the Tariff Board in December shows that these duties are justified. Will not that be an indorsement of their wisdom in framing it? Suppose, on the contrary, it shows that in some respects the duties are not justified, and that mistakes have been made. Would any harm result then from their conforming to that up-to-date information? That is the distinction I want to draw, that the information which will come from the Tariff Board will be up-to-date information, and that the information that you have to-day is at least half a century old.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If that information concerns the subject which the Tariff Board were directed to investigate, namely, the cost of production here and abroad, how does that concern the Democratic Ways and Means Committee in making up a tariff bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I say, I do not admit that this information relates only to the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and I will say that the gentleman from his standpoint is consistent, and always has been, about the question of any information that could be furnished from any branch of this Government. He would not pay the slightest bit of attention to it. He has been consistent from the beginning, and he has finally, in some way or other, induced the majority of the Ways and Means Committee to come to his way of thinking. I congratulate him.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In justice to myself I ask the gentleman to admit that the proper guide in fixing a revenue tariff is the probable receipts at the customhouse, and in the light of the information we had we paid the utmost attention to that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman talks about a revenue tariff. I understand the gentleman was the leader of the movement to put wool on the free list. Is that revenue?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will state to the gentleman that I consider that a proper feature of a revenue tariff.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do you consider that an article which produces no revenue is a proper feature of any purely revenue tariff?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If you put wool on the free list, you can put the duty on the manufacturer's product down to a point where it will honestly compete with the manufactured products of foreign countries, and therefore the revenue on the foreign importations of the manufactured product will be increased.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If you put wool on the free list, will it raise as much revenue as if you put a tariff on it?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Schedule K will raise as much revenue, but you will not be taking that revenue from the material which goes into the clothing of poor people.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand from the report of the committee that the reason why wool was not put on the free list was that if it was put on the free list sufficient revenue could not be raised from the whole of Schedule K.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman did me the honor to point out the fact that I took a different view from some other members of the Ways and Means Committee, and in response to that I state now that I believe we can raise as much revenue from the woolen schedule by putting wool on the free list as we can from the bill which the committee has reported.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand that the gentleman's supporters in his free-wool proposition diminished in about the same ratio that his supporters to abolish any kind of tariff board increased. Therefore, while he was defeated in one proposition he was victor in the other. From every point of view, Mr. Chairman, from the point of view of gentlemen on the other side as well as from ours, this proposition to utterly ignore the Tariff Board, which they as well as we have voted to maintain, their efforts to ram this bill down our throats in advance of any report from it are unjust and ill-advised, and, I predict, will not in the end redound to the credit of the Democratic Party.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. For a question.

Mr. SHARP. The gentleman's remarks sound so nearly like those made upon this side of the House during the discussion of the Payne-Aldrich bill that I want to ask whether he has not had occasion to return to those records and take therefrom his speech verbatim?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SHARP. The gentleman's language is so nearly what this side of the House indulged in during the discussion of the Payne-Aldrich bill that I am curious to know whether he has been reading those remarks and has incorporated them into his speech.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know that any gentleman on that side of the House opposed the Payne bill because they wanted it postponed in order to get an opinion from the Tariff Board. That is my point. I did hear some gentleman say—I think the gentleman from Missouri—that the Tariff Board was a good thing. I did hear the gentleman from Missouri, now the Speaker of this House, and also the gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, say that the Tariff Board was a good thing, but they have changed their position. They have back tracked. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] is the leader on the Tariff Board proposition on that side of the House, to wit, that there shall be none.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; but I am getting along very slowly.

Mr. HARDY. I will make my question brief. I want to ask the gentleman if the Republicans did not decline to wait for a Tariff Board, and for the last 20 years have they not been making Schedule K without a Tariff Board, and if he does not think that we have some reason to put our ideas into a tariff schedule without waiting for a Tariff Board? So that we might, while waiting for a report from the Tariff Board, wait under a Democratic Schedule K instead of a Republican Schedule K?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have not the slightest doubt that the report of the Tariff Board, if you pay any attention to it, will show that your schedule is incorrect.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman think that we have as much information as the Republicans had two years ago to write Schedule K?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think you had it if you had used the right part. I am going to point out that the information printed in your report, what you call the glossary, was prepared 50 years ago, and that that was the basis of your whole bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be discourteous, but I have fairly got started, and I do not care to yield further.

The Tariff Board as it exists to-day is not all that it should be. Its functions are too limited. Its powers are not sufficiently great, and worst of all, its term is precarious because it depends absolutely upon the whim of each succeeding Congress. The Tariff Board ought to be a responsible and permanent branch of this Government. It ought to have full powers to investigate all questions relating to the tariff and ample funds at its disposal to secure for this Government full and complete information in regard to all tariff questions. Such a board, Mr. Chairman, we would have to-day had it not been for the action of the Democratic Party.

I do not intend to go into the history of that legislation; the country knows it, and, Mr. Chairman, the country is going to remember it. We passed in this House the Tariff Board bill by an overwhelming vote, and it passed the Senate later by an overwhelming vote, with only a few amendments, which we on this side of the House who favor a tariff board were perfectly willing to accept, and it was only beaten in the last few moments of the session by a Democratic filibuster conducted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on that side of the House. I again repeat, had it not been for the action of the Democratic Party we would have to-day as a branch of this Government a permanent and responsible Tariff Board.

As I said a moment ago, among the few who did not join in that filibuster were the Speaker of this House and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and, in fact, every Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee save one, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]. As I said before, he has been consistent throughout. He said then and he says now that no report of any Tariff Board would have the slightest influence upon him in framing any tariff measure in accordance with his views; but his colleagues on the committee made eloquent speeches in favor of this proposition. Alas, it now seems that they have back-tracked. Certainly the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has, and I rather suspect that he is doing most of the thinking upon tariff matters, and certainly the thinking so far as this bill is concerned, for his colleagues upon that side of the House. Now, the gentleman from Alabama during the course of his speech the other day was asked some questions by me on this point. I regret that that speech has not been published, for I should like to have put in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the colloquy between the gentleman from Alabama and myself—not to perpetuate what I said, but to reperpetuate as a part of the RECORD what he said.

He said, in effect, and I can not quote his exact language, because it has not been published, that he was opposed to any form of a permanent tariff commission. He said that he had made a mistake when he voted for it before, and that he will never nor, if he can help it, will the Democratic majority on that side of the House ever vote for anything in the nature of a permanent tariff commission. Now, I do not know, and I may be wrong about it, but I have attributed the success in inducing the gentleman from Alabama to turn what we sometimes call a back somersault to the eloquence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], but that may not be true. It may be because of the hard and practical experience that the gentleman from Alabama has had in framing this tariff bill, this and other Democratic tariff measures. I rather think he has been forced to the irresistible conclusion that it is impossible to frame a Democratic tariff measure from facts scientifically acquired. I rather think he has discovered that such a measure must be based, as it always has been, either upon vague rumor or profound ignorance of the facts. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for applying balm to my wounds over free wool, but I want to ask him, speaking about scientific methods of making a tariff, whether he believes it is scientifically possible to ascertain the cost of production of any article in any country, or in all countries, upon which to fix a tariff rate?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it is very difficult to do so, I will say to the gentleman from New York, but I do not think it is impossible to do so, unless the Democratic Party stamp down this present board and prevent the creation of a permanent one.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. What country would the gentleman select as the basis of the estimate of cost of production—France, England, Russia, Zanzibar, or China?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman asks me a question that is impossible to answer in a few words. That is a matter for Congress to determine. Congress may want information as to the cost of producing something in Zanzibar, and I have no doubt that it can be determined if we have a responsible branch of this Government created for that purpose, and if the gentleman and his party do not destroy what we have now.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think it is a question which it is impossible for the Tariff Board to answer. That is the point I make.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My proposition is that while it may be difficult I do not think it is impossible; and certainly the only way to get it is through a Tariff Board, and the gentleman is opposed to that.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman think it is possible to ascertain the general cost of production of any article here at home when he knows that two factories, side by side, vary greatly as to the cost of the production of the same article?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course they vary. The gentleman from New York might be able, through his superior intelligence, to produce a certain article cheaper than I could with my inferior intelligence, but that does not mean it is impossible to secure information which can guide Congress in fixing duties which shall correspond to a reasonable determination of the cost of production in this country and abroad.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Would not the gentleman think it is quite as feasible to obtain the cost of production of articles as it is to obtain the cost of transportation of those articles on the railroads of the country, which we now endeavor to do, and fix railroad rates accordingly through a commission?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course.

Mr. JACKSON. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to make this suggestion: That it is just as possible to determine its reasonable cost as it is to determine the value of any product for taxation. It always must be the approximate value and not the real value.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course. The cost of manufacturing any given article may change from one year to another; but there is one thing certain, it will not change as fast as the opinions of the Democratic Party on this question do from one year to another. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit another question——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. HARRISON of New York (continuing). Which is suggested by the query of the gentleman from Illinois. If it is true that the Interstate Commerce Commission can ascertain facts concerning railroad transportation sufficient to fix the rates, does it follow, therefore, that we can ascertain the cost of production of any article here and abroad unless we can give to our so-called Tariff Board the power to compel the manufacturers to produce their records and cost sheets, both here and abroad, which, of course, we know we can not do?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, there is an essential difference between a railroad corporation and a private corporation. I do not think the affairs of every private corporation ought to be submitted to the inspection of everybody, but I do say that even with the limited facilities that the Tariff Board now have that they are obtaining more accurate information every day as to the cost of manufacturing articles than any other branch of this Government has ever acquired in many years.

I do not pose as a prophet or the son of a prophet, but I want to say to gentlemen on that side of the House that if you think that they can prevent the ultimate establishment of a permanent tariff board or commission, whichever you want to call it, you are grievously mistaken. The people want this Tariff Board, and they are going to get it. I venture that prophesy. In my judgment, there will never be another revision of the tariff by any party which will be satisfactory to the people or which will endure any appreciable length of time, unless it is founded upon facts that will be gathered by a permanent tariff board.

Now, the criticisms made by the committee and by the gentleman from Alabama upon this present Tariff Board are, in my judgment, unjust and uncalled for. It is treated with contempt and held up to ridicule for this reason alone, that it has failed to make a complete report upon the wool schedule.

The fact is that this Tariff Board has only been investigating this subject since, at the earliest, the 4th of last March. During the period of its existence up to that time it was engaged in other business, and neither they nor anyone else expected that they would be called upon to make a report until the 1st of next December. Would the gentleman from New York, devoted son of Yale that he is, ask the Yale crew which is training now for the race some time toward the end of June, in which, I think, will not be successful [laughter]—would he ask the Yale crew to row that race on the 1st of December?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I advise the gentleman from Ohio, as a loyal son of Harvard, not to bank too much upon that race. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will postpone any little remarks I may have to make to the gentleman upon that question until we meet outside of this Chamber. [Laughter and applause.]

So it is plain that it is utterly unjust to criticize this board for not doing what it was absurd that it should be asked to do; utterly absurd that it should be asked to do. I am not here as the spokesman of the Tariff Board, but I resent the injustice and attacks that have been made upon it.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman seems to be familiar with the progress of the work of this Tariff Board and the nature and extent of the work done by the board thus far in connection with the woolen schedule. Would he kindly inform the House whether the board has thus far accumulated any tangible facts that would be of benefit to the House in connection with this pending legislation?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no; of course not. The Tariff Board was instructed to examine into this woolen schedule and report in December. Now, gentlemen can see, and anybody can see, that the time given to them for the completion of their report determines the extent and the scope of it. That is perfectly plain. Now, is not it absurd to say that the investigation of a schedule so intricate as this—and it is the most intricate schedule except possibly the cotton schedule, in the entire tariff—it is absurd to ask a board which has determined upon the scope of its investigation to report at any time, or, at least, at any substantial length of time before that period.

Mr. HULL. Then the board could not even make a partial report upon any material phase of this schedule?

Mr. LONGWORTH. In my opinion, a premature report such as this would be, would not only be valueless, but worse than valueless. It seems to me that that is patent upon its face to any gentleman who is not absolutely blinded by party prejudice.

Now, here is the point I want to make, too—that had we established a tariff commission the same thing would have been true. So far as the personnel is concerned—the personnel of the tariff commission, had it been created, would certainly, so far as the majority Members are concerned, have been identical with the present board, and that is also true, as I have every reason to believe, of the minority. That permanent tariff commission could not have reported before next December upon this schedule any more than this board could, and criticism of either would be equally unjust.

Now, the Tariff Board is not proceeding upon its own initiative in this matter. It is not taking up Schedule K as only a part of its functions. It is giving its entire time to Schedule K, and that by direction of Congress. Its entire force of experts are employed on it here and abroad, in woolen factories, on farms, in investigating sales, in investigating shrinkages, and a hundred other things all over the world. To absolutely flout in advance the results of this investigation—to proceed in the dark when the light is so near at hand—is to my mind foolish, if not worse than foolish.

Gentlemen say that Schedule K is so iniquitous that any change would be an improvement. Now, I am not here to discuss, and do not propose to discuss to-day, the merits or demerits of Schedule K. I am willing to admit, for the sake of argument, that it is the most unpopular schedule in the tariff.

I am willing to admit, for the sake of argument, that most people think that it ought to be revised; but I am not willing to admit, and I do not believe, and nobody can make me believe, that the majority of the people of this country would be willing to revise Schedule K in such a way as to completely destroy either the sheep-raising or the wool-manufacturing business of this country, or both. And yet, is there any man upon that side of the House who can say with any authority that this bill will not destroy the sheep-raising industry of this country? Is there any man upon that side of the House who can say with authority that it will not destroy the wool-manufacturing business of this country?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Of course, the gentleman understands that nobody can say anything with authority as to an event in the future, but I hope he does not want to put this side of the House—I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's speech; he has been interrupted now too much, I think, and has been very courteous and kind, and I do not want to enter into a discussion of that particular subject at this time—but I do not want it to be said by the gentleman that nobody on this side of the House denied that the effect of this bill was going to be the ruination of the wool producers and clothing producers of the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey I used the word "authority" advisedly, because I hope before I get through to show that the main part of the speech made yesterday by the gentleman from New Jersey was without authority; that the conclusions that he reached were based upon the wrong authority; that he based his entire discussion of what he alleged was the discrimination between the woolen and worsted manufacturers upon a distinction between wools of class 1 and class 2, that was outlawed more than 60 years ago, and that, therefore, the gentleman did not speak with authority. That is the reason I used the word.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague allow me to proceed for a few moments without interruption?

Mr. ALLEN. It will come in properly in answer to the question, that is all; but I will wait.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will wait, I will come to that precise question later. This bill reduces the duties on raw wool 60 per cent, and its proponents promise that that is shortly to lead to free wool. Now, I am not going to discuss the question of free wool at this time. Leaving out that question, is there any one of you who can say with authority that a reduction in the duty of 60 per cent would not destroy the sheep-raising industry of the State of Ohio and other States similarly situated?

Mr. ALLEN. Would the gentleman yield there for an answer?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the gentleman consider Mr. Max Silberberg, who is the head of the Wholesale Clothier Manufacturers' Association of Cincinnati, Ohio, a Republican, who served two years in the Ohio Senate, an authority on the subject?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, Mr. Chairman, when I introduced the letter of Mr. Silberberg before the Committee on Ways and Means, I stated that Mr. Silberberg was a Republican, that I had served two terms with him in the Ohio Legislature, and that on the point that he brought out I regarded him as an authority. But Mr. Silberberg never said a thing about destroying the wool interests of Ohio, and if he were here to-day I have no doubt that he would vote as I would do, against reducing the duty 60 per cent on raw wool. He might vote for some changes in the manufactured schedules, as I shall vote when the Tariff Board shows me that I can do so without danger of absolutely destroying that industry. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ALLEN. May I say, then, to the gentleman, in answer to his assumption as to what Mr. Silberberg would do to-day, that I have a letter from him this week, in which he said:

I have read same—

Underwood bill—

over with great care, and pronounce it, even from a Republican standpoint, a good bill; one of the good features of this bill is, it being silent on the existing unjust law that it takes 4 pounds of wool to make 1 pound of cloth.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with him so far, that I doubt very much, and never did believe that it took 4 pounds of wool to make a pound of cloth.

As I said before, I am not here talking about the merits of Schedule K. I am talking about the demerits of this bill. It may be that Mr. Silberberg, though a good Republican, does not possess the information—which may not be great—that I have about the woolgrowing industry of Ohio. I do not believe he would vote to reduce the duty 60 per cent on raw wool. But that is not the question. I certainly shall not vote to reduce it until I have grounds for it, until I have authority for it, and that is what we have not here to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, I have not got fairly started.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The gentleman from New York just came in.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has control of this debate, that if speakers on our side are expected to yield so much time to gentlemen inquiring on the other side we will have no time left to speak.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not want to embarrass the organization. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. It is that side of the House that is asking unanimous consent—a thing that they will not get hereafter in that way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Alabama asked to close the debate.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman comes in here and wants to run the whole business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who is asking to close debate?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asked to close the debate. If the gentleman from New York had been in the Hall of the House he would know it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York if he has a pertinent question to ask.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was speaking of his unwillingness to change Schedule K because of his lack of information?

Mr. LONGWORTH. At this time, I say, and without further information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was not the information on which the President of the United States based his denunciation of Schedule K sufficient to justify a change of this kind?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Possibly a change of another kind, but it does not justify the change you would make.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have every reason to doubt that this bill is an improvement on Schedule K. I have reason to know, from information acquired from this report, that its authors have no facts based on information more recent than that of 50 years ago.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote some real authority, an authority that, I think, will be admitted by gentlemen on that side of the House to be high. I do not believe that there is a man among you who pretends to be a student of political economy that has not read Taussig's History of the Tariff. This work and his other works on the tariff are the standard in this country, and particularly the standard on the tariff from the free-trade point of view. Prof. Taussig has been for years at the head of the department of political economy at Harvard. He has been for years the leader of the free-trade school of thought in this country—at least one of the great leaders. He appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and testified, and among other things he spoke of wool; and I will read in full what he said about wool.

He said:

I will take up the case of wool. I do not believe there is any sound economic reason for maintaining a duty on wool; I think, in principle, wool should be admitted free. At the same time the woolen industry of the United States and woolgrowing in the United States has adapted itself to so great a degree to the present duty on wool that I should not now advocate the immediate sweeping away of the duties on wool. I think the wise policy in regard to the duty on wool is to reduce the duties on clothing and clothing wool from their present rate, and I think no substantial harm will be done to the woolgrowers of the United States, not enough certainly to offset the advantage to the community by reducing those duties one-third, from 12 to 8 cents a pound.

Mr. SHARP. What is the date of that?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on the Payne bill in 1909. Note that he says it would be unwise policy to disturb too greatly either the woolgrowing or the wool manufacturing industries at once, while he still believes ultimately in free trade.

Note that he says:

I think no substantial harm will come to the woolgrowers of the United States, not enough certainly to offset the advantage to the community by reducing these duties one-third.

But, gentlemen, you have reduced them two-thirds. I am speaking of authority. Upon what authority can you state that you will not destroy the woolgrowing industry of Ohio, my State, and other States similarly situated, when you reduce the duty two-thirds, and when this great authority on the tariff, from the free-trade standpoint, says that it would be unwise to reduce those duties more than one-third?

I think the country ought to understand that even from your free-trade point of view you are not proceeding according to the judgment of authority in this country. That is the reason I use the word.

Now, I ask the question, Upon what authority have the majority of the Ways and Means Committee founded their action upon this bill? What new information have they acquired? A careful reading of this report shows that there is nothing new or up to date in it. Your tables are procured from the Bureau of Statistics and other departments. Those figures are up to date, because they are figures which anybody could find. Your facts, however, are taken from some textbooks. I have read them. Most of them are from old textbooks, in many cases entirely antiquated. Now, I want to take up the most interesting feature of this report. On page 226 you have what you call a glossary. The Lord only knows where you got it, from what archives it was dug up, or who prepared it. There are some definitions in this glossary so ancient that not a man here on the floor of this House is old enough to know when they were written. Some of them are amusing, if they are not pathetic, in being brought forward as a basis for a Democratic revision of the wool tariff in this year of our Lord 1911.

I begin with your definition of wool, which is found on page 231. Note this:

Wool—Fibers of all animals are not alike; they vary in fineness, soundness, length, and strength, from the finest merino to the rigid bristles of the wild boar.

[Laughter.]

Is there any gentleman on that side of the House who will accept the authorship of that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will anybody deny it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will anybody deny the authorship of it? I should not be surprised if that was written by the author of "Mary had a little lamb."

It conveys about as much idea to this House about what wool is as is conveyed by that celebrated classic.

They go on a little further, however, and distinguish as follows:

Hair—Hair is straight and glossy, stronger and smoother than wool, and grows sometimes as long as 20 inches.

Now, I am not an authority on hair. [Laughter.] But I have seen the seven Sutherland sisters, and I think any one of them would have an action for damages against the Ways and Means Committee of the House which thus limits the growth of hair to 20 inches.

But that is not all. Here we come to what may be called a "cunning little definition":

Blanket—A heavy covering for a bed or a horse.

Why did you forget the Indians? Have you no regard for the needs of the wards of this Nation?

There is another definition on page 231:

Wether—A sheep after the first shearing.

[Laughter.] I shall not pause to comment upon that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there anything about the Numidian lion being a wild beast?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I might take up an hour in simply reading for the amusement, if not for the instruction, of this House the definitions that are in this glossary, your basis for your entire tariff bill. They would be amusing if they were not absolutely pathetic in being brought in here by a committee of a great party as a foundation of their revision of the wool schedule.

Here is a definition that I want to take up, which is of real importance, and which undoubtedly misled the gentleman from New Jersey, usually a very careful man, in his speech yesterday on that portion of Schedule K which relates to class 1 and class 2 wool. Under this classification of wool on page 227 it says:

Classification of wools—Under the tariff wool is divided into three classes: (1) Consists of what are called carding or "clothing" wools. These are fine wools, short in fiber, and are used for carding and spinning into woolen yarn. They consist principally of wools from sheep of merino blood, and are imported mainly from Australia and Argentina. (2) Consists of long-fibered combing wools, i. e., wools which are used for combing and spinning into worsted yarns.

In other words, the Ways and Means Committee undertook to tell us that to-day wool that goes into woolens is made up exclusively of first-class wool, and wool that is used in the manufacture of worsteds comes exclusively from class 2 wool.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes additional.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Gentlemen, that distinction was true once. It was 60 or 70 years ago that it was true. It was true once that on account of inadequate machinery it was impossible to comb short staple wool, wool of the first class, but more than 60 years ago machinery was invented to make worsted out of short staple wool, and if I should say that to-day 80 per cent of all the first-class wool is used in making worsteds would anybody on that side deny that statement?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I will say to the gentleman that I did not get my information with reference to that subject from the report, but I got it from a bulletin issued by the Carded Wool Manufacturers' Association of this country, and in that bulletin they say, as I recollect it, that the improvement in that particular kind of machinery enables them to use a part of first-class wool, but that does not alter the situation so far as they are concerned with reference to this tariff.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am talking about the authority upon which this great measure is brought in. The gentleman says his only authority is a pamphlet issued by the carded-wool people. I wrote down a phrase used by the gentleman from New Jersey yesterday. He said:

The worsted manufacturer uses imported wool.

Upon what authority did the gentleman make that statement? If there is any authority at all for it, it is absolutely destroyed in another part of their report, because less than one-fifth of all the importations of wool of the first and second class is second-class wool. In other words, five times as much first-class wool is imported into this country as there is of second-class wool. More than 107,000,000 pounds of first-class wool was imported in 1910 and only about 27,000,000 pounds of second-class wool. And yet the gentleman says that the worsted industry depends upon imported second-class wool? That was the gentleman's statement. Does the gentleman claim that less than half of first-class wool is used in worsted?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not deny it; I do not know whether it is true or not. I will say that the consumption of worsted is much less than the consumption of woolens.

The woolens are the cheaper cloth, whereas the fancy worsteds are more expensive.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from New Jersey is absolutely wrong; the cheapest clothing in this country, the cheapest ready-made clothing, are the worsteds.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me, the other day I asked in the War Department, where they have been considering this subject, if I could go to one of the cheap clothing houses and buy a woolen suit as distinguished from a worsted suit, and the gentleman assured me that I could not find one in town.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I doubt if there is 10 per cent of the cheapest clothes ready made in this country that are what you call woolen, in contradistinction to worsted. That shows that even so careful a man as the gentleman from New Jersey has been led astray by this antiquated report. Here is a definition 60 years old, written down by the responsible members of the committee. I have often heard it said that the Democratic Party was 60 years behind the times, but I never saw them admit it in their own handwriting up to now. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] And yet you come in here and say, What is the use of waiting for the report of the Tariff Board on this question; what information can they give us that we have not already got? And here is your information, 60 years old, written into it by yourselves.

Mr. NYE. This report is a "wether" report, is it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is certainly not a fair weather report; but, Mr. Chairman, as I say, I do not care to discuss that definition further. Now, I had expected to call attention to some of this debate, but I have talked longer than I expected. It has been as difficult to extract any information, any authoritative, up-to-date, modern information, from any speech or any presentation of this subject made by gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee as it is from the report.

I intended to go somewhat at length into the discussion the other day as to whether the committee intended or hoped to lower the price of raw wool. They dodged it. Some gentleman, perhaps, had heard from home, and they were not willing to admit that this bill would decrease the price of raw wool. Some gentlemen went so far as to say it would increase it. How utterly absurd, if there is anything in this bill at all. You say it is in the interest of the consumer; that the consumer alone is to be benefited. You reduce the duty on raw wool 60 per cent, and you are not frank enough to come out and say that you expect that will decrease the price of raw wool; and even if some of you are frank enough to say it—and there is only one who has been so so far—you do not know how much. You have made no estimate. You do not know how much it is going to decrease the price of raw wool, and yet I am criticized for asking upon what authority anyone can say this bill will not destroy the wool industry of Ohio.

If this bill does not reduce the price of raw wool, it is utterly futile, and you have no excuse to diminish the revenues of the Government if you do not decrease the price. Yet, according to members of the Committee on Ways and Means, that question was not considered. You made no estimates, and you can not say how much 60 per cent reduction will decrease the price of raw wool—the very basis of your whole bill, your whole theory of legislation in the interest of the consumer.

We know what was the result of decreasing the duty 100 per cent on raw wool. We know that it reduced the price of Ohio wool which you yourselves use here as the standard of wool. We know that it reduced the price of Ohio wool 50 per cent. How much will the reduction of 60 per cent reduce the price of Ohio wool? There are mighty few of you that are willing to admit it will reduce it at all, but if it does not reduce it your bill is a farce.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. If it does not reduce the price of wool—wool being one of the main factors in the cost of woolens and of worsteds—will woolens and worsteds be cheaper? If it increases the price of raw wool and woolens, how are gentlemen like the present Speaker of the House and myself to get along? I having shivered in former Congresses, while he grew cold for the want of woolen clothing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, of course, this bill will inevitably reduce the price of raw wool. It is intended to reduce the price of raw wool. If it does not reduce it the bill is a farce and a failure from your point of view, and yet there is not a man on that side of the House who will assume to say how much it will reduce it, and few admit that it will reduce it, because you have constituents at home that you have heard from.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; on anything but peanuts.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not happen to be interested in peanuts; but I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the Payne bill increased the cost of wool and likewise increased the cost of woolen products?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, the gentleman apparently has not discovered that the Payne law, iniquitous though he may claim it to be, made no change whatever in the wool schedule. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CARLIN. I understand that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, why does he ask me the question if it increased the price of raw wool?

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman knows they made no change from the Dingley bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CARLIN. Then, to be more specific, let us reduce the question to the Dingley bill: Did the Dingley bill, in the gentleman's opinion, increase the cost of raw wool and the cost of the manufactured product?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly it increased the price of raw wool.

Mr. CARLIN. Did it increase the cost of the manufactured product?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I am glad to hear the gentleman admit it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It increased the price over the famine prices produced under the Wilson bill, certainly.

Mr. McCALL. Does the gentleman think it increased the price of clothing to the men who bought the clothes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not want to go into the price of clothing, but we had a good deal of information about it when we undertook to revise the tariff. We had information, and I think it is probably true, that you could never get clothes ready made of a reasonable quality cheaper here than you can to-day. I do not say that is true, but I want to see and hear the report of this Tariff Board. I have heard it confidently claimed that a suit of clothes, a ready-made suit of the cheap worsted, costs no more here than it does in London. I am not an authority for that. I do not want to go into the question of the manufacture of wool. I want to wait until the report of this Tariff Commission comes in, and if you can show me that the duties now carried in the Payne bill upon manufactures of wool are much higher than the difference in the cost of production, than reasonable protective duties ought to be, I will vote to reduce them, but I will not so vote without that information.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Why did not the gentleman express the same anxiety and wait for the report of the Tariff Board when he was arranging the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Because there was not any; there was no such board.

Mr. CARLIN. Why did not you create one? Your party was in power.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We tried to create it, but the Democratic Party prevented it.

Mr. CARLIN. You did not attempt it until after you passed the Payne bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am not going to discuss that question; it is perfectly absurd——

Mr. MANN. It was provided for in the Payne bill.

Mr. CARLIN. You have been in power for 16 years, and had the power to do it. Why was it not done?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will not yield further for that kind of a question. Now I am nearly through, and I hope to conclude in a few minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman a question about wool, because I think he is an authority on it. If this bill will reduce the price of wool in Ohio 50 per cent, as I understood him to state, is not it a clear admission that 50 per cent of the present value of wool in Ohio is due to a law of Congress and not to the law of supply and demand?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not say positively that this bill will reduce the price of Ohio wool 50 per cent. I said the Wilson bill did; but without splitting hairs, I answer "No" to the question.

Mr. SIMS. Why not, if the repeal of a law will reduce the price?

Mr. LONGWORTH. You can not produce wool in Ohio on high-priced land except in small quantities. Bear in mind there are no large flocks in Ohio. The sheep are raised on high-priced land in small flocks and by average, everyday farmers. That can not pay very well in direct competition with men who have 40,000 and 50,000 in a flock of sheep in Australia, say, where they graze on land worth practically nothing. The tariff is imposed to equalize the difference in the cost of production of wool here and abroad to maintain that industry. If you take the protection off and allow the wool to come in and flood the market, it necessarily drives that industry out of business.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would rather go on. Mr. Chairman, it has long been a subject of academic debate as to how far the interests of a Member's particular district ought to influence him in voting upon great questions in tariff policies. Some hold on the one hand that they are all-compelling. Others hold that they should be subordinated to the interest of all the people of all the country.

That is the old question of whether the tariff is a local issue or a national issue. Some of us, of course, are apt perhaps to yield our opinions upon questions of national policy when a home industry is concerned. It was for that reason that the entire delegation from the State of Virginia appeared before the Ways and Means Committee when the Payne bill was being framed and asked for an increase of duty of 400 per cent on peanuts.

Mr. CARLIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was in the delegation and never appeared before your committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not know that the gentleman was a Member at that time.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes, sir. I think the gentleman is making an incorrect statement unintentionally. I do not think there was more than one Member from Virginia interested in peanuts, and that was the gentleman from the second district.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There were three, at least. At any rate, it was represented that Virginia wanted 400 per cent increase of duty on peanuts, for the precise reason that they were unable to compete against low-priced peanuts.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I want to correct the gentleman, inasmuch as one of the gentlemen from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is in the chair and unable to defend himself. I desire to state on behalf of the Chairman, the present occupant of the chair, that he did not appear before the committee in behalf of an increase of tariff on peanuts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentlemen regard the protecting of the interests of their constituents as a slight upon their record, I withdraw the statement, excepting so far as the gentlemen who spoke to the committee and whose names appear in the record. That was a local issue. I do not know whether the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] is for free trade in peanuts or not, and I do not care.

Mr. CARLIN. I am not interested in peanuts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They do not grow in your district.

Mr. CARLIN. It took the gentleman from Ohio 16 years to become in favor of a Tariff Board.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I do not know what that has to do with this question. Now, without debating that question, I think I can say for myself that I am not, in my opposition to this particular bill, influenced unduly by the interests of my district. I have never counted the sheep in my district, but I doubt if there are a hundred. I have never counted the woolen mills in my district, because there are none.

My colleague from the second district has counted the sheep in his district, and he says there is only one, and that sheep is in the zoo, and so he says he does not care how low the duty on wool is placed. At least the gentleman is so reported in the newspapers.

Mr. ALLEN. May I say that that was published as a joke in a Republican newspaper?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I thought I read it in the Cincinnati Enquirer.

Mr. ALLEN. I think you read it in the Cincinnati Times-Star. What I have said is that our promise was to revise the tariff gradually, and that this bill is a compliance with that pledge.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think not. Is it true the gentleman does not care what is done with wool because there is only one sheep in his district and that sheep is in the zoo? That is the purport of the gentleman's interview. Now, I can not bring myself to keep my tariff opinion entirely locked up at home. I can not forget that while my district is mostly in the city of Cincinnati it is also in the State of Ohio. I can not forget that while there are very few farmers in my district there are thousands upon thousands in the State of Ohio, and that they are there, as they are everywhere else, the backbone and sinew of the community. I am not willing to ask for reasonable protection for an industry in my district and deny to the farmers in Ohio outside of my district reasonable protection on their most important product.

Mr. SHARP. May I ask the gentleman a question for information entirely?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes more on the express understanding that he uses it himself.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I realize that I have talked much too long.

Mr. SHARP. I would like to ask a question just for information. It is because I have the honor to represent one of the largest sheep-growing districts in the State of Ohio that I would like to get the gentleman's views as to what he knows about the sheep growers and wool raisers in Ohio getting an active competition in the prices for which they sell, and whether, on the other hand, there is not, if not an organized trust, at least such a prevailing condition among the buyers of wool that they really do not get anywhere near their just proportion of the benefit of the tariff imposed upon the raw wool, compared with that which the manufacturers themselves receive?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to my colleague that that is possible. I do not know all the conditions of wool manufacturing, and do not pretend to know.

I am not sure whether the farmer gets all of his protection—all the protection from the duty—but I do know that when wool was placed on the free list the number of sheep in Ohio fell from substantially 4,000,000 to little more than 1,000,000, and I know that during the years of the Wilson law sheep were selling at 50 cents apiece. I know that. I do not know whether a 60 per cent reduction will be so disastrous as that, but I have reason to believe that it will be, and that is the reason why I oppose this bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I promised the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I would finish. Otherwise I would be glad to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have already talked much too long, Mr. Chairman. It is said that sheep raising in Ohio is a dying industry. It was a dying industry, as I just stated, in the days of the Wilson law. As the gentleman from Ohio will remember, it recovered almost to its former proportions within a year or two after the placing of the present duty on raw wool. We know that. We know those facts. But you say that sheep raising in Ohio is a dying industry.

I ask any gentleman on that side of the House to ride through Ohio on a railroad train, and I venture to say that in most of rural Ohio he will never be out of sight of sheep on either side of the car. It is universal, gentlemen, throughout rural Ohio. You do not see any large flocks; you seldom see a flock of more than 100; but you see the flocks everywhere, on low-priced land and on high-priced land, on small farms and on large farms. There is no such thing as a great flockmaster in the State of Ohio.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just for a question or a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman for one question.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman says that there are 71,000 owners of sheep in Ohio?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not say so, but I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Colorado. The sheep-raising industry is practically the farming industry of Ohio. Practically every farm in the State has sheep, and the profits of that farm at the end of the year are made up largely, in the majority of cases, of the result of the sale of the wool of those sheep; the wool, mind you, not the mutton. It is the wool that makes the Ohio farmer prosperous. If you have a reasonable duty on wool, the Ohio farmer is prosperous.

If you put wool on the free list, he goes out of business. It may be possible—I do not say it is not possible—that that industry could survive under a reduction of the present duty. Some people say it could not survive if the duty were at all reduced. I do not know, and I do not believe a man in this House knows; and it is for that reason that I will not to-day vote for any reduction in that duty, and least of all for a reduction of 60 per cent, without further information than I now possess.

Mr. FAISON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I can not yield any more. I am sorry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. While I regret that we should be confronted under these circumstances with this revision of the wool schedule, there are some compensating advantages. It has served, in my judgment, to emphasize beyond all question the necessity for a responsible and permanent tariff commission, and it has emphasized beyond all question the fact that that can only come by a Republican vote. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] was the "lord high executioner" of that bill last year. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is the "lord high executioner" this year, and now he is leading a solid party and has a united Democratic majority against any form of a permanent tariff commission.

I welcome this bill, because it shows to the country that the mask has been torn off; that the Democratic majority are opposed now, and will be opposed hereafter to the creation of a permanent tariff commission, and that such a commission can come only if the Republican Party is restored to power in every branch of this Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY].

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, a very remarkable speech was made on this tariff bill in the House the other day by one of those manufacturers, of whom I hope there are a great many in this country, who have the courage to reply solely on their own energy and ability for success. He was too modest to state his own business experience which enabled him to make such a very effective speech. If we turn to the Congressional Directory we find simply this about him:

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Democrat, of Brooklyn, was elected to the Sixty-second Congress, receiving a majority of 3,700 votes.

Now, I think it is important that the people of this country shall know what kind of a man WILLIAM C. REDFIELD is and what his experience has been.

In 1879, at the age of 21 years, Mr. REDFIELD entered the office of the largest manufacturers of printing presses in the world, and remained there for five years. In that employment he became familiar with the operation of a large factory and with the principles of its operation, including the cost of material, the cost of labor, the erection and operation of machinery, the methods of paying labor, and of managing mechanical work.

During the years 1883 to 1885 he was cost keeper for a concern which manufactured machinery used in sugar refining, the chief part of whose product was sold abroad. This concern was one of the largest then in the business and made many kinds of sugar machinery. It was Mr. REDFIELD'S special duty to be entirely familiar with, and to figure and record the cost of, each part of this machinery, both in labor and material.

In 1885 he entered the employment of a concern which then and now manufactures machinists' tools. This concern, in 1885, was the smallest of eight concerns in the country engaged in a similar business and started in a wooden shack which it rented. It now owns, and uses for the manufacture of its goods, a plant covering two city blocks.

Mr. REDFIELD remained with this concern for 16 years, becoming first a partner and later the treasurer of the corporation organized to carry on the business, leaving it to become commissioner of public works for Brooklyn in 1902.

He returned to this company as its president in 1905 and withdrew from active connection with the business at the close of that year, retaining his interest in it.

Mr. REDFIELD, for the purpose of establishing a foreign business for the concern of which I have just been speaking, made a preliminary trip to Europe in 1893. He spent 10 months in Europe in the year 1900 looking out for this foreign business, and during that time made three complete tours of the commercial centers of Great Britain and visited many of the leading commercial centers of Europe. He then had an office in Paris, France.

This concern now sells its goods in all of the commercial countries on the continent of Europe and in Great Britain, and its business in these countries was in an entirely satisfactory condition at the time when Mr. REDFIELD severed his connection with it, and has constantly increased in volume since that time.

The products of this company are not protected in any way by patents and are sold in open competition with the world, especially in competition with manufactures of Great Britain and Germany, who have imitated some of its product.

In 1907 Mr. REDFIELD took up the business of manufacturing blowers, fans, and similar apparatus for heating, cooling, ventilating, and drying, and is still interested in such business, being vice president of a company which has works in two of the large cities of the country.

Mr. REDFIELD has charge of the exports of the last-mentioned concern. It had a foreign business prior to 1909, but made no particular effort to extend it. Since 1909 Mr. REDFIELD has given his especial attention to this foreign business, and now it is developing with very satisfactory rapidity.

I omitted to say that this corporation, of which Mr. REDFIELD is now the vice president, is one of the leading concerns of its kind in the world.

In the year 1907 Mr. REDFIELD visited Great Britain in connection with his business and, as stated in his speech, obtained certain information in regard to methods of manufacturing. He was able to obtain this information on account of his very friendly relations with some of the manufacturers of that country.

In the fall of 1910 Mr. REDFIELD started on a business trip around the world, a trip which he had to cut short in order to attend the present session of Congress. This trip was made for the purpose of increasing the business of his company in all parts of the world, and he visited all the important centers of Japan, also Manila, Hongkong, Canton, Singapore, Batavia, and Soerabaya in Java, Penang, Rangoon, Calcutta, and Bombay, stopping in London, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam for business calls.

The people with whom Mr. REDFIELD has been dealing during these years are largely manufacturers both at home and abroad. He has had no special facilities for the sale of the goods of his company, but has been obliged to enter into open and sharp competition and to obtain orders on the merits of his goods.

That Mr. REDFIELD'S qualifications to set forth graphically and accurately the conditions upon which success in competitive business depends were appreciated, not only by Members on this side of the aisle, but also by our Republican friends, is shown by a conversation which took place between two Republicans while he was speaking. One of these Republicans, and they are both very prominent among the Republican Members of the House, suggested to the other that he ask Mr. REDFIELD some questions, of course for the purpose of weakening the strength of his statements. This other Republican replied that he did not care to do so, as he thought that Mr. REDFIELD knew what he was talking about. To this opinion everyone must concur.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in view of the length to which this debate has proceeded, I would not desire to take any of the time of the House or to avail myself of the leave given to extend one's remarks in the RECORD if it were not for certain statements made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who has just taken his seat. With eloquent vehemence he has asked "by what authority" those who favor this bill are able to say that it will not destroy the woolgrowing industry of the United States. He has attempted no defense to Schedule K of the present tariff law, but has addressed his whole argument to the suggestion of imaginary evils which are to follow the present effort to revise it. There are two methods by which a change of any law may be prevented—one a frank defense of the existing statute, and this the gentleman knows to be impossible; the other an attack upon any change which may be suggested.

Of all the fallacies upon which the high duties of the present wool schedule have been maintained, none has been so potent as the oft-repeated assertion that the life of the woolgrowing industry in America is bound up in the maintenance of these rates. The shrewd, farseeing men who planned this law well knew the force of this suggestion. It sounded good to the woolgrower to be told that the woolen manufacturer, the purchaser of his product, was willing that there should be a duty on raw wool and would help him to get and retain it. It was flattering to the shepherd to be invited to write that portion of the schedule to suit himself; and from 1867 to this day, when any suggestion of a change in the wool schedule has been made, the American farmer has been put in the front of the fight. How often have we been told, as the gentleman has just told us, that the free-wool clause of the Wilson bill sounded for the time being the death knell of the sheep in the United States, and how often has the farmer been warned to beware of Democratic candidates lest that evil day should come again? This assertion has become the stock in trade of Republican orators, the sine qua non of Republican editors, and, if one may judge by the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio and by the minority report presented with reference to the pending measure, it has become the chief, if not the only, argument of Republican statesmen. And yet, Mr. Chairman, in the face of these repeated statements I dare assert that the wool producer has received little or no benefit from any of the tariff duties on his wool, and that the tariff has proved neither the life on the one hand nor the death on the other of the woolgrowing industry in the United States. And I further assert as a corollary to these propositions that the so-called destructive effect of any reduction in the duties on raw wool is a campaign bogey invented by the superheated imagination of Republican orators.

In my judgment, this can be made clearly to appear without going further for illustration than the wool produced in the gentleman's own State of Ohio.

In order to make my point it is not necessary to go fully into all the details of Schedule K. Its history begins with the famous Syracuse conference held in 1865, where the lion of the wool manufacturer and the lamb of the woolgrower are supposed to have lain down together. There is respectable authority for the statement that these two classes of producers did not as a body understand and support the views of this meeting. There is good evidence to show that it was promoted chiefly by a few manufacturers of New England producing carpets and worsted goods and some prominent sheep breeders who raised fine bucks and wished to sell them at a high price. The fact, says Prof. Taussig, in his Tariff History of the United States, that the rates of duty as arranged in the Syracuse convention were especially advantageous to certain manufacturers, those who made carpets, worsted goods, and blankets, tends to support this view. Be that as it may, a bargain was then and there struck by which it was agreed that the woolgrower should have any duty that he might demand. He was assured that the amount of this duty would be added to the price of his wool and paid to him by the American manufacturer. The manufacturer, accordingly, the price of whose raw material was to be so raised, should have a so-called compensatory duty sufficient to protect him against loss thereby, and, in addition, a duty frankly intended for protection. This was the scheme in broad outline. It was supposed to guarantee to the American woolgrower a higher price for his wool than that prevailing for similar wool in foreign markets, and the manufacturer was supposed to see that he got it, without loss, however, to himself. When the law was passed in 1867 the woolgrower accordingly was baited with a minimum duty on wool of 10 cents per pound and 11 per cent ad valorem. The manufacturer, on the false and fictitious theory that it required 4 pounds of wool in the grease to make 1 pound of cloth, was first allowed a compensatory duty of 50 cents per pound on cloth to offset the supposed increase in the price of his raw material, and, in addition, an ad valorem duty for protective purposes of 35 per cent. True, the manufacturers stated that they desired a protective duty of only 25 per cent ad valorem, but the additional 10 per cent was added to cover the internal-revenue tax then still in force. And then these coconspirators proceeded to build up an abstruse system of classifications of wool and manufactured goods, and presented to a willing and obedient Congress the whole mass of specific, compensatory, protective, and compound duties, with intricate and involved classifications, deliberately designed to conceal from Congress and the consumer alike the real advantage which was being given. This was the birth and genesis of Schedule K as we now know it.

The internal-revenue tax of 10 per cent was repealed within a year or two. The industry thrived and grew, improved machinery was invented, the output increased, consumption multiplied, and yet, upon each succeeding revision of the tariff, these same gentlemen or their successors have appeared before Congress, crying like the daughters of the horse leech, "Give, give." And so duties, high enough at their creation, have from time to time been raised, until the outraged conscience of the American people has swelled their murmur of discontent to the fierce storm of protest which broke upon the country last fall.

But in spite of the maintenance of the compensatory duties for the manufacturer, nothing is clearer than that the bargain with the woolgrower has not been kept. The additional price for his product has not been paid to him, and the duty on the imported article has not been reflected in the domestic price. Let us take for purposes of illustration the grade of wool known as Ohio fine unwashed and its prices for the past 20 years. This is a wool largely grown in the State of Ohio as well as in the State of West Virginia; it belongs in the class known as clothing wools, and its chief foreign competitors are the Australian wools produced on Merino sheep or Merino cross-bred. During the 20 years under consideration four tariff laws have been in force, their dates and rates of duty on clothing wools being as follows:

McKinley Act, October 6, 1890; duty, 11 cents per pound; if washed, double the regular duty.

Wilson Act, August 28, 1894; free.

Dingley Act, July 24, 1897; duty, 11 cents per pound; if washed, double the regular duty.

Payne-Aldrich Act, August 5, 1909; duty, 11 cents per pound; if washed, double the regular duty.

It will thus be seen that except for the interval between August 28, 1894, and July 24, 1897, wool of the class under discussion has been dutiable continuously at 11 cents per pound. Now, if this duty has inured to the benefit of the wool producer, it must show in the price of his product, and during the time when it has been in force he should have enjoyed a correspondingly higher price than his foreign competitor.

But what are the facts? I present a table showing the average annual price from the years 1890 to 1910 of Ohio fine unwashed wool in the Boston market, and the prices in the London market of Port Philip, an Australian wool of the same class, and the average import price, less duty, of all clothing wools unwashed during the same years.

I regret that I have been unable to obtain the prices in London on Port Philip wool after the year 1902.

These figures are most instructive. In 1891, for instance, under the McKinley tariff, Ohio fine unwashed wool brought in Boston 21¼ cents per pound, Port Philip brought in London 19.6 cents, and the average price of all clothing wools imported was 23 cents per pound. What had become of the 11 cents per pound tariff duty which the manufacturer was supposed to pay the American wool producer and which, by his compensatory duty, he was permitted to add to the price of his cloth? This was the implied promise made by the manufacturer to Congress and to the wool producer at the time a compensatory duty was imposed. It was supposed that by this duty he would be enabled to pay and would pay to the American woolgrower a higher price for his wool than to the foreigner; otherwise, why this compensatory duty to the American manufacturer at all? A glance at the table will show that the American wool producer, year in and year out, with the advantage of a cent here and the loss of a cent there, tariff or no tariff, has been compelled to accept the same prices received by his foreign rival, and that wool sells in Boston at substantially the same price realized for similar grades in London. Any such difference in price as there may be in favor of the American wool producer is so slight as to be readily accounted for by difference in transportation or any of the many factors affecting market conditions entirely apart from the tariff.

But, of course, the gentleman from Ohio has said and will say that during the life of the Wilson Act, for instance, in the year 1895, the price of wool reached in the United States its lowest level during a period of 30 years. This is true, and the argument with the unthinking may have weight, but two facts rob it of the importance claimed; first, that, as shown by the table, a corresponding decline within the same period took place in the wool markets of the world. Look at the figures. Beginning with the year 1890, when the decline set in, which, be it remembered, was under the McKinley Act, the Boston price of Ohio fine unwashed was in that year 21½ cents. It fell off each year thereafter until the year 1895, when it reached 12½ cents.

In the following year, 1896, it began to rise, and so continued for several years. Look, now, at the other columns in the table. The average value of imported clothing wools was 23 cents per pound in 1890, and it began to decline, and reached in 1895 15 cents per pound, a loss of 8 cents per pound, or precisely the same loss as that sustained by the grade of domestic wool which we have chosen for our illustration. In the London market Port Philip wool sold in 1889 at 23 cents per pound, and fell off gradually until 1894, when it reached the low-water mark of 16 cents per pound, a net loss of 7 cents per pound from the year 1889. These coincidences are too striking to be overlooked. It can not be said that the free-wool clause of the Wilson Act had anything to do with depreciating the value of imported wools or lowering the price of wool in the London market. On the contrary, all things being equal, it should have increased the foreign price, because it stimulated the demand for wool in the United States and enlarged our importations. And yet we find a like decline appearing in the foreign market during the same period of time with substantially the same severity.

Nor is this all, when we turn to the price of other agricultural products we discover the same phenomena. Wheat in this country in 1890 was bringing 83.8 cents per bushel; in 1895 it brought 50.9 cents, a decline of 38 per cent, having declined steadily in every year since 1890. Oats in 1890 brought 42.4 cents per bushel, and in 1895 19.9 cents, or a loss of 53 per cent. Corn in 1890 brought 50.6 cents per bushel, and in 1895 25.3 cents, or a loss of 50 per cent. The average value of horses in 1890 was $68.84 per head, and in 1895 $36.29 per head. These are the figures of the Agricultural Department. Beginning with the year 1890, two years before the election of President Cleveland and four years before the passage of the Wilson Act, a general decline in the price of agricultural products had set in, which ran the same course and with substantially the same severity as the decline in the price of wool, which we have already noticed.

Table of prices, agricultural products, 1890 to 1897.

Years.	Wheat, per bushel.	Oats, per bushel.	Corn, per bushel.	Horses, per head.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1890	83.8	42.4	50.6	$68.84
1891	83.9	31.5	40.6	67.00
1892	62.4	31.7	39.4	65.01
1893	53.8	29.4	36.5	61.22
1894	49.1	32.4	45.7	47.83
1895	50.9	19.9	25.3	36.29
1896	72.6	18.7	21.5	33.07
1897	80.8	21.2	26.3	31.51

And when we turn to the markets of the world we discover what, of course, all informed men knew, that the period from 1890 to 1895 was one of general declines, extending not only to agricultural products, but to industries of all sorts, and that the recuperation began with the close of 1895 and the opening of the year 1896. Will anyone pretend that for this world-wide condition the Wilson Act of 1894 was in any way responsible, or can it for a moment be asserted that the low price of wool in the years 1894 and 1895 in the United States is traceable to that cause?

But before our friends are done with this argument there are other questions to be answered. Recurring again to our table, we find that the Boston price of Ohio fine unwashed wool in 1909 was 25½ cents. As a matter of fact, in my section the high-water mark for that year was 30 cents. In 1910, in Boston, it sold for 24 cents and in my section as low as 22 cents per pound, while in this year, 1911, it is quoted at from 17 to 18 cents, or, in other words, a loss of at least 7 cents per pound since the year 1909. All this under the beneficent operation of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. How much lower it will go no man can tell. The gentleman from Ohio was asked whether the Payne-Aldrich law had increased the price of wool, to which he answered:

The Payne-Aldrich law as to raw wool did not change the Dingley rates.

Of course it has not increased the price, but will any gentleman be good enough to explain why it should fail to maintain it if the tariff is, in fact, the life of the wool producer?

But leave the question of prices for a moment. To ascertain whether the present Schedule K has promoted the sheep-growing industry in the United States one has but to consult the statistics for the last 30 years. Since the year 1890 the statistical totals of the Department of Agriculture include both sheep and lambs, but eliminating the latter we ascertain that in 1880 there were in this country sheep of the shearable age 42,192,000; in 1890, 40,786,000; in 1900, 39,853,000; and in 1910, 39,069,000. Is it any wonder that Mr. Theodore Justice, a witness before the Ways and Means Committee in 1908, testifying in favor of the present schedule, was compelled to admit that at the present rate of increase in sheep as computed by him it would take until 1997 to produce enough sheep to raise the 650,000,000 pounds of wool required for our annual consumption? I wonder whether in that estimate Mr. Justice took into consideration the increase in population or anticipated progressive race suicide. It is true that owing to improvement in breeding we are to-day producing more wool from fewer sheep. For instance, in 1880 we produced 232,500,000 pounds of wool, while in 1910 we produced 328,111,000 pounds of wool, but the production of wool per capita, in proportion to the increasing population, has declined from 4.6 pounds in 1880 to 3.6 pounds in 1910.

I have been at some pains to ascertain from the auditor's reports of the State of West Virginia the number of sheep since the year 1870 in my own State and in the district which I have the honor to represent. While the matter is chiefly one of local interest, it illustrates the general point, and I shall insert the tabular statement as an appendix to my remarks.

I thus discover that the low-water mark of the sheep industry in West Virginia, so far as the number of sheep is concerned, was not in any of the years when the Wilson Act was in force, viz, from August, 1894, to July, 1897, but is in the year 1904, after the Dingley Act had been in force for seven consecutive years, at which time we had within the State of West Virginia 314,269 sheep, as against 395,856 in the year 1897, the lowest year under the Wilson Act, and 680,718 in the year 1884, when the sheep industry of the State was at its height. If it be true that the Wilson Act slaughtered the sheep which perished from 1890 to 1897, I should like the gentlemen using this argument to tell us what was the cause which decimated the sheep in the year 1904.

Nor is the story in the State of Ohio any different. The number of sheep in Ohio at the end of each of the last five decades was as follows:

	Number.
1870	4,929,000
1880	4,903,000
1890	4,061,000
1900	2,648,000
1910	2,898,000

And the fleece-wool production was as follows:

	Pounds.
1870	20,540,000
1880	25,004,000
1890	20,988,000
1900	20,351,000

There is no fallacy more fatal than the argument that all which follows a given event must have been caused by it. The other day in the City of Mexico there was a disastrous earthquake immediately following the surrender to the Mexican revolutionists. No doubt there are many superstitious Mexicans who believe that the earthquake was a divine visitation resulting from the revolt against the established government. The gentlemen say that the Wilson Act was passed, sheep declined in numbers, and wool fell in price, therefore the Wilson Act was responsible. They can be answered with equal force that the Dingley and Payne Acts were passed, sheep declined in numbers, and wool fell in price, therefore the Dingley and Payne Acts were responsible. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways.

Of course it will relieve campaign orators, and in some instances Members of Congress, from looking below the surface to find the deeper reasons, but a cause which relies upon this argument alone runs great risk when under careful scrutiny. Especially is this true with an industry affected by so many factors as the one under discussion. The rise in the price of grazing lands, increasing tillage, truck farming, gardening, dairying, cattle grazing have throughout the history of the sheep industry in the United States tended to drive it from one frontier to another, until to-day the backbone of the industry, from the woolgrowing standpoint, is to be found in the Rocky Mountain States. Sheep raising on a large scale can only be conducted with profit where lands are cheap and grazing plentiful. For this reason it is that the broad prairies of Argentina and the thinly settled areas of Australia are to-day the great sources of the world's wool supply. In more thickly settled districts sheep have been and will continue to be kept, but it can never be for profit on their wool alone. Where markets are close and accessible they have their mutton value, and, in addition, they help to clean the land on which they are grazed, and to fertilize it in return. These are the considerations, and not the tariff, which insure the continuance of sheep raising in the United States. Be it a high tariff or low tariff or no tariff at all, the raising of sheep in the more populous States, where land values are high, is, and must continue to be, purely incidental to other farming operations.

If facts and figures can prove anything, they clearly show that the tariff on wool has not been reflected in the price to the American wool producer, notwithstanding it has been carried into the total value of the finished product and charged by the manufacturer against the American consumer. The American producer has been offered his choice of accepting in the Boston market substantially the same price which his competitor received in the London market; or, if he preferred, shipping his wool abroad. The latter has never been resorted to; and, of course, could only be done with the disadvantage incident to cost of transportation and marine risks. In the year 1910 we consumed in the United States 584,669,867 pounds of wool. Of this we produced at home 328,110,749 and imported 256,606,638 pounds. Every pound so imported paid duty, realizing to the Government in revenue $21,128,728.74. A proportional increase in value was added to the cost price of the manufactured product, whether made of domestic or imported wool; but the word of promise was made to the American woolgrower and broken to his hope. He sells his wool in a market from which competition has long ago disappeared, and he takes the price which the allied manufacturers desire to give him, or he goes without. The other fact which appears with equal clearness is that the tariff on raw wool has utterly failed to expand the woolgrowing industry in the United States, or even to prevent its decline.

I submit that the time has come when we should cease to tickle the ear of the wool producer with the tale of impossible benefits or burdens. Let us be honest not only with ourselves but with our constituents, and admit, in the language of a recent learned writer on this subject, that—

The assertion frequently met that the very existence of the sheep industry of the country depends upon the duties finds no substantiation in the facts of history.

This author, Mr. Chester Whitney Wright, has presented in his volume, Wool Growing and the Tariff, the most exhaustive and impartial study of the subject made in recent years, and after tracing the history of the industry in this country from its earliest beginning to this date, he concludes:

It must now be plain that the grossest exaggeration has characterized general discussion and reasoning in regard to the connection between the tariff and the woolgrowing industry. Indeed, one of the most valuable conclusions to be reached by a study of this chapter of our economic history is that the tendency to overestimate the power of the tariff, either for good or for evil, is almost universal. For this tendency the almost perpetual presence of the tariff in the political arena is no doubt mainly responsible. In discussions upon the subject an attempt is invariably made to simplify the situation by leaving out of consideration the numerous other factors and then applying the argument post hoc, ergo propter hoc. This method is employed on both sides of the question; free traders and protectionists alike are guilty. It must be admitted that the woolgrowing industry is unsually complicated, and that the neglect of other factors is in this case peculiarly misleading. But there is no lesson that can be applied to the tariff which would be productive of more good than the one to be drawn from the situation here exemplified. The importance of the tariff as a factor in the industrial history of the country has too long been grossly magnified.

So much for the interest of the woolgrower, as such. May I be permitted a word more by way of contrasting Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich Act and the method of its making with the bill under discussion?

Of all the grievous penalties in the medieval code none was more fatal to the victim than the sentence of outlawry. He against whom that dreadful decree was pronounced became at once caput lupinum. An outcast and a wanderer, in daily terror of his life, he bore a price upon his head, and might be slain at will like a wolf within the woods. No man's hand was raised in his defense; no tongue was heard to speak for his vindication. This prolonged discussion has shown, if nothing else, that to this sad and melancholy estate Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich Act has already fallen. None are there to defend it and few so poor as to do it reverence, and it seems indeed doomed to go—

Down to the vile dust from whence it sprung,
Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

To such a state was it predestined long before the assembling of this Congress or the beginning of this debate. The President of the United States, titular head of the Republican Party, in an address at Beverly, Mass., is reported to have said:

The woolen schedule is indefensible, and I propose to say so.

Later, in his famous Winona speech, after again denouncing it, he said:

When it came to the question of reducing the duty at this hearing in this tariff bill on wool, Mr. PAYNE in the House and Mr. Aldrich in the Senate, although both favored reduction in the schedule, found that in the Republican Party the interests of the woolgrowers in the far West and the interests of the woolen (worsted) manufacturers in the East and other States, reflected through their Representatives in Congress, was sufficiently strong to defeat any attempt to change the woolen tariff, and that had it been attempted they would have beaten the bill reported from either committee.

Just two years ago this month when this legislative iniquity was struggling to be born the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] declared in the other end of this Capitol that:

All students of the tariff question must realize that this particular schedule relating to wool and woolens, essentially a necessary of life, should, above all others, be carefully reconstructed as to the manufactures of wool and revised downward. But this schedule has not been reconstructed in accordance with the petitions of the American people nor the pledges of the Republican platform.

Other distinguished members of the Republican Party, both in this Chamber and in that, have joined with Democrats the great chorus of denunciation and disapproval, and last, but by no means least, came the unkindest cut of all from the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who, though he presided at the birth of this act and lent to it his own name in baptism, has openly declared his regret at the part he was compelled to play. In his speech made at Lyons, N. Y., on the 23d day of September, 1910, he is reported to have said:

The result of our deliberations was most satisfactory to me in general results, although there were other items, like those of the woolen schedule, which I was anxious to revise. It was a source of great disappointment to me, after two exhaustive and extended hearings, that I was not able to present any program that a majority of the committee would adopt for a revision of this schedule. The reason was not that the committee was unduly influenced by those interested, but that they could not agree upon the labor cost of producing wool and woolen goods in this country and abroad with a reasonable profit to the producer. Of course, this left the woolen schedule where it was in the Dingley Act, with one or two small reductions in duties.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, is this unhappy schedule disowned and bastardized in the house of its father. The gentleman was "anxious to revise it." It was a source of "great disappointment" to him that he could not do so and that the schedule remained as it was in the Dingley Act. What stronger admission can be expected from that source of the necessity for revision and what more pathetic apology for the failure to perform that duty? And when we attempt to square the gentleman's explanation with that in the President's Winona speech, we catch a side light which is most illuminating. The reason, says the gentleman from New York, was not that the committee was unduly influenced by outside interests, but only that it could not agree. The reason, says the President, was that in the Republican Party, the woolgrowers of the West and the woolen manufacturers of the East were sufficiently strong to defeat any attempt to change the woolen tariff, and had it been attempted they would have defeated the whole bill. How different the two pictures thus presented. Was the failure to revise this schedule two years ago the fault of struggling statesmen striving in vain to a just conclusion, or was it, in fact, the work of a sinister power too strong even for this Chamber to resist which postponed the hour of common justice?

I have read the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of this House two years ago when this schedule was under consideration. I have perused the minority report upon the pending bill, with its prophecies of disaster, and I have listened to the mournful jeremiads of the gentleman from Illinois and others on this floor who declare that if the present bill shall pass it will not build up manufactures, but will abandon the wool industry to destruction. It is the old, old story. Few appear before congressional committees to tell a different tale.

A distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, prominent both in name and in lineage, no less than in personal achievement, Mr. Charles Francis Adams, wrote on this subject in 1908 to a distinguished Member of this present body as follows:

Speaking after the fashion of men, they are either thieves or hogs. I myself belong to the former class. I am a tariff thief, and I have a license to steal. It bears the broad seal of the United States and is what is known as the "Dingley tariff." I stole under it yesterday; I am stealing under it to-day; I propose to steal under it to-morrow. The Government has forced me into this position, and I both do and shall take advantage of it. I am therefore a tariff thief with a license to steal. And—what are you going to do about it? The other class come under the hog category—that is, they rush, squealing and struggling, to the great Washington protection trough, and with all four feet in it they proceed to gobble the swill. * * * To this class I do not belong. I am simply a tariff thief. * * * But, on the other hand, I am also a tariff reformer. I would like to see every protective schedule swept out of existence, my own included. Meanwhile, what inducement have I to go to Washington on a public mission of this sort? A mere citizen, I represent no one. * * * Meanwhile, have it well understood that my position is exactly the position of tens of thousands of others scattered throughout the country; to ask us to put aside our business affairs and at our own expense to go to Washington on a desperate mission is asking a little too much.

With Schedule K thus discredited in Congress and out of it, and condemned in the great court of public opinion, it seems hardly worth while at this time to run over the prolonged catalogue of its faults and inequalities. The wonder is that it should have survived so long, notwithstanding the enormous and potential forces mustered to uphold it. Begotten in greed and spawned in falsehood, it has thrived to this day on one long series of deceits.

When there was added to the protective duty of 25 per cent asked for in 1867, 10 per cent additional to cover the internal-revenue tax, it was deceit which retained this 10 per cent long after the internal-revenue tax had been repealed. When a compensatory duty of 50 cents per pound of cloth was given to the manufacturer on the theory that it took 4 pounds of wool in the grease, taxed at 11 cents per pound, to make a pound of cloth, it was deceit which hid from Congress the fact that in many grades of cloth 1, 1½, 2, or 2½ pounds of wool only are necessary to make a pound of cloth, and that in still other cloths the place of wool is taken by shoddy, cotton and its substitutes, and that this so-called compensatory duty, instead of returning to the manufacturer what in theory—but in theory only—he was compelled by law to pay to the woolgrower, gave to him, in fact, a large and exorbitant measure of protection. And it was deceit which persuaded the woolgrower that the duty on raw wool coupled with this compensatory duty to the manufacturer would raise the price of his wool—a thing which, as I have shown, it has utterly failed to do.

It was deceit that framed the innumerable classifications by weight and prices of the articles covered by this schedule and built up the pyramid of compensatory, specific, and ad valorem duties so that the common man could no more determine from this law the amount of tax he was called upon to pay than he could decipher the King's decree on the walls of an Assyrian temple. And it was deceit which, by this simple expedient, hid for years from the American people that the average ad valorem tax on woolen manufactures was 90.1 per cent, on woolen or worsted cloths of the cheapest grade 144 per cent, on blankets of the cheapest grade 93.58 per cent, on flannels for underwear as high as 154.35 per cent, on shawls 96.4 per cent, and on carpets 76.29 per cent. And it was deceit which also hid from the people the fact that the heavier taxes were imposed upon the cheaper goods.

Nor was the fraud and cunning of these gentlemen exhausted with the framing of the law. No sooner was it in operation than began that steady degradation of American cloths by the intermixture of cotton, shoddy, and like substitutes, which has given to the American people for wear to-day the poorest cloth in the world.

In the same fashion we are told that the act has inured largely to the profit of the American workingman and that the burden of any disturbance must fall first upon him. I have looked with interest over the 20 pages attached to the committee's report in this case, which contain the sum total of the information furnished by the Tariff Board at the request of the Committee on Ways and Means. Here is a body of alleged experts, who, after being in existence 18 months, are requested by the Ways and Means Committee to furnish it with such information as had been collected. They reply that the data thus far collected on that subject would not, in their opinion, be useful for purposes of legislation, and they would therefore not communicate such data to the committee; and after this top-lofty declaration they supply the 20 illuminating pages which constitute Appendix C of the report. I venture the assertion that any $60 a month bookkeeper, having before him the Statesman's Year-Book, the yearbooks of the Agricultural Department, the Statistical Abstract for the current year, and a few trade journals, could, with paste and shears, assemble all of the information contained within those 20 pages in 24 hours.

But I did read in that dreary waste one single paragraph of interest. We are told that—

> The Immigration Commission, in its study of the woolen and worsted industry, secured detailed information from 23,388 employees. Of the total number of employees studied, 61.9 per cent were foreign born and 24.4 per cent were of native birth but of foreign father, and 13.7 per cent were native-born persons of native father. The average weekly wage of the male employees 18 years of age or over was $10.49 and of the female employees $8.18. The average annual earnings of the male heads of families who were employed in the industry were $400, and of all males 18 years of age or over in the households studied, $346. The average annual income of families the heads of which were working in the industry was $661.

This single pargaraph, Mr. Chairman, speaks volumes with reference to the advantages accruing to the American workingman under the beneficent operation of Schedule K. What does it mean that, after 40 years in this industry, out of 23,688 employees investigated only 13.7 per cent were native born of native parents? What does it mean that 61 per cent are foreign born? What can it mean except that, while the American manufacturer with the aid of prohibitive tariffs has excluded his foreign competitor from the American market, the American-born workingman has been selling his labor free in the markets of the world and has been underbidden by his foreign competitor? And what becomes of all the talk about the "American standard of living" when a man is asked to live and raise a family on the paltry wage of $10.49 per week?

In contrast with the present law, the pending measure commends itself to me for at least three reasons:

First. By its abolition of the complex and compound duties and the involved and intricate classifications of the present act. Laws are written to be understood, and any law which is on its face unintelligible, involved, and mysterious should be condemned without further argument.

Second. By its abolition of specific duties, with their injustices and inequalities, and its substitution of ad valorem duties which readily adjust themselves to changed and changing conditions.

By common consent, the only really scientific and just method of laying a customs duty is the ad valorem system. To borrow the illustration of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], we may have three articles of the same character but of different values, worth $1, 50 cents, and 25 cents, respectively. A specific duty of 10 cents on each means 10 per cent ad valorem on the article worth $1, 20 per cent ad valorem on the article worth 50 cents, and 40 per cent ad valorem on the article worth 25 cents, thus making the burden of taxation the heaviest on that article which can least bear it. It is this which has made of the present Schedule K a bill to tax the poor and exempt the rich.

Of course, the objection is made that an ad valorem duty encourages undervaluations and promotes fraud. This is the stock argument of those who prefer specific duties and the secret advantages which they offer. Can it be imagined for a moment that Schedule K would have lasted so long if the people had understood that the duty on flannels was as high as 154 per cent ad valorem? But those who advance this argument do not stop to think that it proves too much. Not only the present Schedule K, but every other schedule of the present tariff law contains certain ad valorem duties. The argument of possible undervaluations applies just as well to a compound duty, part specific and part ad valorem, as to a duty wholly ad valorem. Not only so, but the same argument can be and has been used against any tariff laws whatever, since they promote not only undervaluations, but smuggling and similar frauds, of which the recent crimes committed by the Sugar Trust under specific duties are striking examples. And, pressing the argument to its final conclusion, it can be made just as well against the system of taxation in use in every State in the Union where, in the main, ad valorem taxes alone are laid and collected.

No law of any sort can be adopted except upon the theory that it will be obeyed. No statute is of any value unless honest men are selected to enforce it. But granted honest and capable collectors and appraisers at the customs ports, there is no commodity in the world more capable of exact valuation and the grades of which are more easily recognized than raw wool.

Third. By its reduction of the burdens of taxation on the American people while preserving the revenues necessary for the support of the Government. Taking the importations for the current year, it is easy to ascertain just what ad valorem rates the Payne-Aldrich Act has fixed on certain common articles. In comparing them with the rates of the present bill the advantage to the consumer is immediately apparent, for instance.

The Democratic Party recognizes that the only excuse for any taxation is the raising of revenues sufficient to support the Government, when economically administered. It denies that the powers of government can be used to guarantee profits to any class of its citizens, or that any benefit can rightfully be conferred by law on one man which all do not alike enjoy.

No stronger indictment of Republican tariff making could be drawn than the showing that notwithstanding the burden on the consumer has been cut in two, the revenues of the Government derived from the woolen schedule will be practically undisturbed by the passage of this bill. No greater proof could be given that Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich Act was framed not for the benefit of the Government but for the benefit of private interests; not to raise money for the general welfare but to put profits into the pockets of a special class. In all the history of lawmaking, there is no more vicious example of special privilege. With such privilege the Democratic Party is now and always has been at war, and it presents this bill in evidence of its entire good faith and of its earnestness of purpose.

As I say, we hear from the other side no encomiums upon the existing law, but in the criticisms of this bill strange and inharmonious discord. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] complains that the rates are so low that they will destroy the woolen industry. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] would seek to amend the bill by putting all worsted cloths on the free list. How is it possible to accommodate legislation to views so diverse? It may go without saying that this bill can not be universally satisfactory. If we are to wait until a tariff bill can be framed which will be entirely satisfactory to the manufacturer, the producer of raw material, the consumer, and last, but not least, the politician, or if, judging by past progress, we are to wait for detailed information from the present Tariff Board, there will be no legislation this side of the millenium. The people are demanding this revision; they are entitled to it now, and I rejoice that the present committee has not permitted any interest to write its own bill and offer it to this House for passage. May God forbid that such a system shall ever find countenance under Democratic auspices.

[1] No report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to comment briefly on the sudden and unexpected zeal of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] for a Tariff Board and his attempt to justify his refusal to favor tariff legislation until a report can be had from such a board.

The Republican platform adopted prior to the last campaign declared unequivocally in favor of an immediate revision of the tariff at a special session of Congress to be convened in March.

Nothing was said in that platform about waiting for a report from a tariff commission or board, and no declaration was made in that platform in favor of the establishment of a Tariff Board; but the platform commended the work of the Committee on Ways and Means, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was then a member, for the efficient preliminary work it had done in preparation for the promised revision of the tariff; and it was assumed that the Republican Party was fully prepared to revise the tariff when it made the promise to do so, or otherwise it would not have promised the revision.

In its revision every schedule of the tariff was revised excepting the woolen schedule—that was not changed. It has remained unchanged since 1897.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] says that he will not favor any change in it until he can obtain a report from the Tariff Board, and for that reason he is against this bill at this time. The gentleman from Ohio has been a Member of Congress for 10 years, and not until certain facts developed, when an attempt was made to change the woolen schedule, did it occur to his mind that it would be advisable to have a tariff commission created to report upon this schedule.

The President of the United States, another Ohio man, made a notable speech at Winona, Minn., in September, 1909, a month after the Payne law went into effect, and in that speech he made this statement:

> When it came to the question of reducing the duty at this hearing in this tariff bill on wool, Mr. PAYNE, in the House, and Mr. Aldrich, in the Senate, although both favored reduction in the schedule, found that in the Republican Party the interests of the woolgrowers of the far West and the interests of the woolen manufacturers in the East and in other States, reflected through their Representatives in Congress, was sufficiently strong to defeat any attempt to change the woolen tariff, and that had it been attempted it would have beaten the bill reported from either committee. I am sorry this is so, and I could wish that it had been otherwise. It is the one important defect in the present Payne tariff bill and in the performance of the promise of the platform to reduce rates to a difference in the cost of production, with reasonable profit to the manufacturer.

Where did the President get the information upon which to base that statement? He did not wait for the report of a Tariff Commission or a Tariff Board, but it was so apparent, even to the inexperienced and unlearned in tariff matters of the occupant of the White House, that he made that public condemnation of this schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the same speech the President advocated the creation of a tariff board, and since that time the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has been vociferous in his advocacy of it. What reason did the President give for the creation of a tariff board, or the necessity for one? It was not given until after he had declared, upon the information which even he possessed, that the woolen schedule was indefensible; and he based his earnest advocacy for the creation of a tariff board upon the exigencies of the political situation in the Republican Party. It was deemed necessary or desirable to create such a board in order, as he said, to get the Republican Party solidified, so that it might present a united front to the country.

In the same speech, speaking about a tariff commission or board, which he advocated, he said:

> Now, I think it is utterly useless, as I think it would be greatly distressing to business, to talk of another revision of the tariff during the present Congress. I should think that it would certainly take the rest of this administration to accumulate the data upon which a new and proper revision of the tariff might be had. By that time the whole Republican Party can express itself again in respect to the matter and bring to bear upon its Representatives in Congress that sort of public opinion which shall result in solid party action.

Solid party action! When the Payne law was brought into this House there was an unfortunate condition politically on the Republican side of this Chamber. The insurgents were at the height of their fame, and the President believed that it would be highly desirable to have some excuse to defer action upon this schedule until the party could be united. The Republican Party went to the country upon that plea, and the country responded in no unmistakable terms and swept them from power in this House and placed on the Democratic Party the duty of revising the tariff in the interest of the people rather than in the interest of a combination of woolgrowers and woolen manufacturers. I know that the Democratic Party proposes to carry out in good faith that command of the people, without reference to a report from a tariff commission, highly desirable as the delay which would be necessary to obtain such a report would be to the Republican Party in the meantime to enable it to so solidify that it would vote unitedly and unanimously against such measures as are proposed by the Democrats in the House to eliminate the glaring abuses in the existing tariff, with which the country is familiar and which the people demand be corrected.

I hope this will end this hypocritical talk about the value of a tariff commission. If I take special pride in anything I have done during my service in this House, it is in the part, large or small, that I had in defeating the bill to create a tariff board in the closing hours of the last session of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FAISON].

Mr. FAISON. Mr. Chairman, I desired to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] who has just taken his seat a question, as he spoke of the wool schedule with such authority; but he denied me the time, and I rise simply for this statement in connection with his speech. The gentleman from Ohio, in the absence of any argument whatever in defense of his party's position against the present bill reducing the tariff on raw wool and woolen goods 60 per cent, attempted to get funny, and ridiculed the Democratic Party as being antique and obsolete—in fact, 60 years behind on wool-tariff schedules. He "spake with authority," he said, and credited himself with still greater authority, and yet was waiting for further authority—the future report of his Tariff Board—before he or his party could indorse further tariff legislation; yet he did not, nor dared not, defend the present wool schedule—Schedule K. The gentleman from Ohio, a high protectionist himself, strangely admitted that all the authority with which he spoke was from a free-trade source—Prof. Taussig, of Harvard University, his own alma mater, whose History of the Tariff was standard authority. Now, notice the gentleman's inconsistency, if you please. He stated:

Prof. Taussig appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and pleaded for a reduction of 33⅓ per cent in the Dingley bill on all woolen manufactured goods.

But instead of taking such standard authority, the gentleman's party adopted the higher and "indefensible" rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill. If the Republican Party failed to accept such standard authority as Prof. Taussig, how, then, can the gentleman or his party consistently plead for more time? [Applause.] The burden of his speech was wait, wait, wait for more time and more authority. How absurd and how ridiculous is the gentleman's position! [Applause.] But, mark you, he desires to wait while the tariff is highest, while the profits to the manufacturer are greatest and the burden to the consumer is heaviest. Why not follow the gentleman's authority and cut the wool schedule 60 per cent, which is entirely in keeping with Prof. Taussig's advice, and then wait, if necessary, for still further standard authority—even the report of the gentleman's Tariff Board. [Applause and laughter.] The gentleman certainly places his party in a ludicrous, absurd, and ridiculous position, and in the light of the returns from the recent election, which resulted in the large Democratic majority in this House, the Republican Party will soon become extinct and its history will be "obsolete and antique"—far more "antique" than the gentleman from Ohio would desire to admit. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, and that is, If the majority for Gov. Harmon in Ohio last year did not exceed all the woolgrowers in Ohio put together, regardless of politics, and if these woolgrowers did not know or believe that the Democrats would at least attempt to keep their promise and reduce all unreasonable tariffs?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that the majority for Gov. Harmon in Ohio next time will not exceed anything.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, the gentleman does not answer the question, but makes a prophecy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON].

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I realize that in the creation of mind and matter, very few things were created exactly alike, and hence it is expected that men will differ about things that they have to contend with in this life. That being so, it is naturally expected that we should have many men of many minds, and, upon the tariff question, we have about as many different opinions perhaps as were ever entertained upon any question that ever confronted any people at any period of the world's history. In this country we have the high protectionist and the low protectionist, the free trader, the tariff-for-revenue advocate, and, perhaps, some other kinds of tariffites that lack of time will not permit me to go in search of.

It having been decreed that men should have different minds upon different questions of great moment, it is necessary for us, under our form of government, to have parties to bind individuals when it comes to dealing with great economic questions like this, or else there would be legislative chaos that would destroy the splendid institutions of our country and convert its citizens into a clamoring mob that would never be able to reach a conclusion that would redound to the best interests of the American people.

It is, therefore, both wise and necessary for the citizens of this country to organize themselves into political parties; but when they do so organize, good conscience and decency ought to impel their adherents to live up to the teachings and declarations of their respective platforms as long as they are members of them. A man is just as much a traitor to the party to which he belongs when he plays "hide and seek" with the policies of other political parties as he would be to his country in time of war, if, while belonging to the fighting forces of his country, he played "hide and seek" with the enemy.

In this country we have two great political parties that have been contending against each other since 1856, but it is impossible for them to maintain their party integrity unless their membership will be true to the obligation resting upon each and every one of them to uphold their party principles. These great political parties have been declaring themselves upon important questions in their national conventions for many decades, and it seems that each and every citizen of this Nation ought to know by this time just what the declarations of the two parties are upon the great economic questions of the day, the most important of which, at this time, seems to be the tariff question. But it appears that self-interest, if nothing else, has produced many different constructions of the declarations of the platforms of the two leading parties of the Nation upon that question, and hence it becomes necessary for those who can see the question from an unbiased view to show just what the true principles of the parties are, when honestly and intelligently construed. The Democratic Party, to which I am proud to belong, has never made a declaration upon the tariff question that did not indirectly, if not directly, declare for free raw material for the manufacturers, while the Republican Party has steadfastly stood for a tax upon them.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] in a speech a few days ago stated that the Democratic Party had never declared for free raw material, while I insist that it can be clearly shown that the party has invariably declared for a tariff for revenue only, which, when logically construed, is a declaration in favor of free raw material.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. FRANCIS. In the levying of a tariff for revenue, does the gentleman mean to do it indiscriminately?

Mr. MACON. I will answer that question during the course of my remarks. The Democratic Party has always declared for a tariff for revenue only to defray the expenses of the Government when honestly and economically administered, and it was never intended by that declaration that any tax other than the amount necessary to raise just that much revenue should be laid upon anything used, manufactured, or produced by the citizens of this Union. Nothing can be found in the platforms of the Democratic Party that would cause any one to conclude that it favored protection for protection's sake for any business within the confines of the Nation.

Mr. FRANCIS. Another question. If you do levy a tariff discriminately, what are you doing but discriminating as to the business affected by that tariff? If you do levy a tax discriminatory, what are you doing but discriminating against certain businesses? You can not levy a tax blindfoldedly. The man who levies a tariff must do it with some degree of discrimination. That is not high protection, but when you do that, though it be a tariff for revenue and though you have the word "only" there, you discriminate to that extent in favor of some business. That is my position.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman, I will say that inasmuch as it is necessary to raise some part of our revenue for the maintenance of our Government by a tariff tax, we must necessarily lay it upon some article of production, and, in doing so, discriminations must be made against some businesses as well as against some individuals. The system compels discriminations.

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Mr. MACON. But the Democratic policy has been to lay it upon those articles that are the least necessary—in other words, that are classed as luxuries—and it insists that no part of the tariff should be laid upon the necessaries of life until the supply of revenues raised from that source, or the opportunity to raise them from that source, has been exhausted. After the supply of revenue levied upon articles of that character has been dissipated and it is found to be necessary to have more revenue, then it insists that the tariff should be laid upon those articles that will be next in order along the line indicated, but that under no circumstances ought a tariff ever be levied upon anything for purposes of protection per se.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will try to get back to the point that I digressed from in order to answer the gentleman's question. As indicated a few moments ago, the Democratic Party has never adopted a platform that was not indirectly, if not directly, in absolute harmony with the policy of free raw material, and whenever anyone upon this side of the aisle undertakes to show to the contrary they will have to employ the expressions of individual members of the party in defiance of platform declarations and the organized action of Democrats in Congress to substantiate the position they take, while those of us who believe in the doctrine of free raw material take the platforms of the party and the organized action of Democratic Members of both Houses of Congress for more than half a century to support the firm and unyielding Democratic foundation upon which we stand.

Let us now look to the Democratic platforms of the party for information upon the subject. But slight reference was made to the tariff in the platform adopted in its national convention in 1856, its declaration upon the subject being confined to the following language, which I will read:

The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world.

Nothing in that declaration could be construed as favoring the protection of raw material, but it does contain something that conveys the idea that the party at that time was not only in favor of free raw material, but it was in favor of some other free things as well. The platform of 1860 was silent upon the tariff question.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACON. I will.

Mr. FOCHT. Would the gentleman undertake to draw an illustration of that tariff of 1856 as an argument in favor of the passage of this bill?

Mr. MACON. Oh, no. Under no circumstances or conditions would I do so silly a thing.

Mr. FOCHT. I thought not.

Mr. MACON. I am not talking about the passage of this bill right now. I will get to that a little later. I am trying to show by the declarations of Democratic platforms that the party has always been in sympathy with the idea of free raw materials. The next platform was adopted in 1864, and it, like the one of 1860, was silent upon the tariff question. In paragraph 6 of the 1868 platform, after declaring for certain administrative reforms and policies, it declared for "a tariff for revenue" upon foreign imports. The wildest advocate of a tariff upon raw materials can not find anything in that declaration in sympathy with his position, and no sort of protectionist can find any comfort in it. In the platform of 1872 the tariff question was left to the various congressional districts to deal with. While that was not Democratic, nothing is contained in it that would encourage anyone to believe that even that chaotic convention, which was composed of the odds and ends of different parties, was in favor of protection for protection's sake, whether it was laid upon the manufacturer's raw material or upon the finished product. It will be remembered that that was the convention that nominated Horace Greely for President, and no one would expect a convention that would nominate him for President to be entirely sound upon any Democratic question.

The platform of 1880 declared for "a tariff for revenue only." Certainly no one would construe that declaration to mean protection upon either raw or finished products.

In the platform of 1884, after denouncing the Republican Party for its many unrighteous acts, it proceeded to declare that it (the Republican Party)— professes the protection of American manufactures; it has subjected them to an increasing flood of manufactured goods and a hopeless competition with manufacturing nations, not one of which taxes raw materials.

Surely the raw-material-tax advocate can not find a single letter or word in that declaration that will justify the conclusion that the Democrats of the Nation, duly, assembled in a national convention, were at that time in favor of a tariff on raw material.

In the platform of 1888 we find the following language upon the tariff question:

The Democratic Party of the United States, in national convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives at the convention of 1884, and indorses the views expressed by President Cleveland in his last earnest message to Congress as the correct interpretation of that platform upon the question of tariff reduction; and also indorses the efforts of our Democratic Representatives in Congress to secure a reduction of excessive taxation.

In order to arrive at an intelligent and worthy interpretation of the meaning of the tariff declaration contained in that platform it will be necessary for us to examine the views "expressed by President Cleveland in his last earnest message to Congress," and to inquire into the efforts of our Democratic Representatives in Congress at that time "to secure a reduction of excessive taxation," as well as to further reflect upon the declaration contained in the 1884 platform, which condemned the Republican Party for its professions of protection of American manufactures while subjecting them to an increasing flood of manufactured goods and a hopeless competition with manufacturing nations, "not one of which taxes raw materials." Let us, therefore, examine Mr. Cleveland's "earnest message" upon the tariff question and see what it contains. It reads as follows:

The radical reduction of the duties imposed upon raw material used in manufactures or its free importation is, of course, an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these necessaries. It would not only relieve them from the increased cost caused by the tariff on such material, but the manufactured product being thus cheapened, that part of the tariff now laid upon such product, as a compensation to our manufactures for the present price of raw material, could be accordingly modified. It is not apparent how such a change can have any injurious effect upon our manufactures. On the contrary, it would appear to give them a better chance in foreign markets with the manufactures of other countries, who cheapen their wares by free material. Thus our people might have the opportunity of extending their sales beyond the limits of home consumption, saving them from the depression, interruption in business, and loss caused by a glutted market, and affording their employees more certain and steady labor, with its resulting quiet and contentment.

When the platform declaration is read in the light of that clause of President Cleveland's message, just quoted, it shows beyond doubt that the Democrats, in convention assembled, in 1888, were in favor of free raw material of every kind and description. But if anything further is needed to add to the light that is thrown upon the platform declaration by the President's message it will only be necessary to show that that part of the platform which indorsed the efforts of our Democratic Representatives in Congress "to secure a reduction of excessive taxation" was nothing more nor less than a specific indorsement of the Mills tariff bill, which provided for free wool and other raw materials. If that is not a specific declaration for free raw material I would be much pleased to have some one tell me just what it is.

Another reasonable inference contained in that platform is, that if the tariff on raw material was removed it would not be necessary to lay a compensatory tariff upon the finished product of the manufacturer to compensate him for the tariff on raw material that he is compelled to buy at a protected price before he can make the finished product. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the 1888 convention indorsed the utterances of Mr. Cleveland in his "earnest message to Congress" and indorsed the Mills bill then pending in Congress, which provided for free raw material, including raw wool, I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS], in all fairness, if it was not a direct declaration in favor of free wool and other raw materials?

But let us look to the next Democratic platfrom, which was adopted in 1892, upon which the party won the greatest victory it has had within the lifetime of any Member of this House, and see whether anything can be found in it that could be construed to be a committal of the party to protection of any kind whether laid upon raw materials or manufactured articles. It reads:

We denounce Republican protection as a fraud—a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purposes of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

We denounce the McKinley tariff law, enacted by the Fifty-first Congress, as the culminating atrocity of class legislation; we indorse the efforts made by the Democrats of the present Congress to modify its most oppressive features in the direction of free raw materials and cheaper manufactured goods that enter into general consumption; and we promise its repeal as one of the beneficent results that will follow the action of the people in intrusting power to the Democratic Party.

Another specific declaration in favor of free raw materials, and yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON] both declared upon the floor of this House that the Democratic Party had never declared in favor of free raw materials in any of the platforms that it had ever adopted in any of its national conventions.

The platform of 1896 declared that—tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue, such duties to be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country and not discriminate between class or section, and that taxation should be limited by the needs of the Government, honestly and economically administered.

In 1900 the platform declared that—tariff laws should be amended by putting the products of trusts upon the free list to prevent monopoly under the plea of protection.

The Democratic platform of 1904 contained the following strong declaration against protection, to wit:

We denounce protection as a robbery of the many to enrich the few, and we favor a tariff limited to the needs of the Government, economically administered, and so levied as not to discriminate against any industry, class, or section, to the end that the burdens of taxation shall be distributed as equally as possible.

There is nothing in either of the foregoing declarations of the last three platforms that "smacks" of protection of any kind. To the contrary, it is bitterly denounced as a robbery of the many to enrich the few. Our protectionist Democrats can certainly find no consolation in any of them.

That brings us to the last platform adopted by the party in 1908, and there is not a letter, word, or line in it that indicates that the Democratic Party is in favor of protection in any form. It is so fresh in the minds of the people and of the membership of the House that I do not deem it necessary to quote the tariff language contained in it.

Mr. Chairman, every Democratic House within the last 60 years has either passed or attempted to pass a bill providing for free raw materials. The Morrison bill, in 1886, provided for free wool and other raw materials, as did the Mills bill in 1888. Following that was the Springer bill, with its free raw material provision, including wool, and the Wilson bill of 1904; and all of them were presented to the House by unanimous reports from the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee; and every one of them, as just stated, provided for free raw materials.

Mr. Chairman, none of the Democratic platforms adopted within the lifetime of any of the Members of this House having had incorporated in any of them anything that by any kind of reasonable construction could be strained into conveying the idea that the party has ever stood for a tariff on raw materials, and no Democratic Congress for more than half a century having passed a tariff bill that did not provide for free raw material, except iron and coal, in 1894, you can imagine my great chagrin when it became generally known that this Democratic House proposed to turn its back upon the teachings and declarations of our party and pass a tariff bill providing for a tax upon raw wool. I, for one, am not ready to desert the principles and declarations of the "grand old party" in its struggle to relieve the taxpayers of the many unjust tax burdens that they are bearing; and every sane man in all of this land well knows that it can not fulfill its great mission along that line as long as a tariff for protection's sake is placed upon raw materials. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, as a religionist, I believe in preaching a crucified Savior, and should that doctrine cause the religion I love to perish from the face of the earth, I am ready to see it go; and I am that kind of a Democrat that believes in preaching that brand of true Democracy that has been declared and adhered to by all true Democrats from time immemorial in all of its conventions and in both branches of Congress up to this time, and if preaching the true Democratic doctrine of the fathers shall cause the Democratic Party to lose its prestige as a great political organization, I am ready to see it sink into eternal oblivion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If our party is to live, it must do so upon principle; and it is the duty of every member of it to courageously and truthfully uphold its policies, just as much as it is the duty of the conscientious religionist to uphold the tenets and teachings of the denomination to which he belongs, never suffering any of them to be traduced, maligned, or misrepresented by the sin-cursed part of the membership of the denomination without raising a voice against the action of those heretics who would destroy them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, much has been said in praise of the Walker tariff law by Members who are in favor of a tariff on raw material, because that measure placed a tariff on raw materials. But let us see what Mr. Walker said about the bill that he was the father of, after becoming familiar with its operations. Among other things, he said that "that act was susceptible of great improvement, in that it should have put the raw material of manufactures on the free list, as was the practice of all enlightened nations." In an open letter, addressed to the people of the United States, of November 30, 1867, after denouncing the protective system of the Republican Party, he said:

After a close investigation of this subject and after examining the tariffs and the manufacturing establishments of foreign countries in 1851–52 and 1863–64, I am convinced that to admit the raw material of manufactures in all cases duty free would greatly increase our wealth, augment our exports, imports, and revenue, and diminish the burdens of taxation. Let us remember that in taking the duty off raw material the consumers, the people of the United States, get the manufactured article at a lower rate. This, then, is another step in the reduction of taxes.

Mr. Chairman, that letter contains a tariff sermon that every true Democrat ought to preach from the housetop, if need be, for it is the true gospel of Democracy and is in the interest of the toilers, upon whom rest every establishment, enterprise, and industry within the confines of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, in view of all the declarations of the Democratic Party in favor of free raw material, the action of all the national Democratic legislative organizations and the declarations of such tariff apostles as Secretary Walker, President Cleveland, Chairmen Morrison, Mills, Springer, and Wilson, I earnestly and sincerely ask where raw-material protectionists find Democratic ground upon which to stand? A Member of the House said to me a few days ago that as long as a tariff was placed upon manufactured products he was in favor of a corresponding tariff upon raw materials. He said that he would be willing to vote for a reduction of the tariff on manufactured woolens to 20 per cent, which would make it equal to the tariff on raw wool, as provided for in this bill. That kind of an arrangement would compel the manufacturer to pay 20 per cent upon the raw material that he must purchase, but would give him no compensatory tariff whatever. If his proposition should be adopted in the revision of Schedule K, it would certainly be an unjust and unwarranted discrimination against the manufacturer. Under his plan the manufacturer would have to pay the 20 per cent levied upon raw wool, and hence, when given a tariff of 20 per cent upon his manufactured material, he would be in no better position than he would have been if no tariff whatever had been levied upon either the raw or manufactured material. In plain words, this Member, who happens to represent a district that produces raw wool, would be willing to tax the manufacturer 20 per cent on the raw wool without giving him any tariff benefit whatever, and he would do that in the face of the fact that every civilized country in the world admits raw material free of duty while they place a tariff on manufactured products. Do you suppose the Member who made that statement was talking for the general welfare of his country or for the particular interests of the men who produce raw material in his congressional district?

The greatest evil connected with our tariff system is to be found in putting a tariff upon raw materials, for in order to make the manufacturer equal to the raw-material man in the matter of protection it becomes necessary to lay a compensatory duty upon the manufactured article to compensate the manufacturer for the tariff upon the raw material that he must buy before he can manufacture the finished product. If a tariff of 20 per cent is laid upon raw wool and the manufacturer of woolens is given 20 per cent upon his manufactured product he will have no protection whatever. Therefore, in order that an injustice may not be done him, it becomes necessary to not only give him a 20 per cent duty, but in addition thereto a compensatory duty of 20 per cent must be given him to equalize his tariff benefits with those given the raw-material man, and that compensatory tax is protection pure and simple and has no relation whatever to a tariff for revenue only, but the poor devils who handle the pick and the plow are called upon to pay it just as they do the revenue tariff. If no tariff was placed upon raw wool then a 20 per cent tariff on the manufactured product would be all that it would be necessary to levy for revenue purposes, and that would also be a sufficient amount of tariff to enable our manufacturers to compete with manufacturers in tariff-protected countries. That policy would greatly reduce the burden of tariff taxation upon manufactured woolens that the consumer is compelled to bear under our system. I do not understand how anyone could be so greedy and unjust as to want his parent Government to do more for his industry than to guarantee to him equal competition with the manufacturers and producers of the other countries of the world. I can not understand how a raw-material man can make up his mind to ask any greater benefit than that of an open door to all of the markets of the world for his products. The producers of wool, cotton, hides, lumber, and other raw materials in this country can take their products to any quarter of the globe without let or hindrance and compete with raw-material producers upon terms of open and honest competition,

While I am one of the poorest friends on earth to the protective tariff system, I can yet see some slight reason why a tariff should be given to the manufacturer of this country as long as other countries put a tariff tax upon his products when they are imported into foreign countries. In other words, as long as our manufacturers are charged with a tax upon their finished products when they send them into the markets of the world, I can see some reason why it is necessary to protect the home manufacturer by placing a tariff upon manufactured imports from foreign countries so as to make him equal with foreign manufacturers in an open and honest competition in all of the markets of the world. If the markets of other countries were free to the manufacturers of this country I would be opposed to placing any tariff whatever upon commodities that are imported into it to compete with his products, for, in my judgment, when God created man and placed him upon the earth he intended that he should have a free and open race for the goal of his ambition, unhindered in any way by his rival in the contest. But greedy man has undertaken to destroy that God-given principle of justice between man and man by enacting laws that will give speed to one of the contestants and hinder the other in their efforts to win the prize of life. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, is it just and right to do such a thing even though the contestants happen to reside upon different sides of the unfathomable ocean? I have heard several of the advocates of a tariff on raw material insist that they were not protectionists, but that they wanted a tariff laid upon raw materials for the sole purpose of raising revenue. Gentlemen, do you believe that that is the only reason such advocates have in mind when they clamor for a tariff on raw materials? If so, I would like to know where the Members of this House who are now in favor of a tariff on raw wool, peanuts, iron ore, and coal, for revenue only, were when the "free-list bill," taking the tariff off of lumber and many other things, thereby reducing the revenue of the country at least $20,000,000, passed the House a few weeks ago? None of them raised their voices against the reduction of that much revenue then, but when it comes to reducing the revenue raised on raw wool by something like $15,000,000, they not only raise their voices, but hold up their hands in holy horror against such a willful "destruction" of the revenues of the country.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. FRANCIS. The gentleman claims that those Democrats in this House who voted for a tariff on raw wool are protectionists. The gentleman, as I understand it, wants a tariff on manufactured woolen goods. If that is true, why is not the gentleman a protectionist?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I tried to explain to the gentleman a moment ago that it was absolutely necessary to lay a tariff on some of the products of this country as long as our present system exists.

Mr. FRANCIS. The fact is——

Mr. MACON (continuing). And I tried to show the gentleman the difference between laying a tariff upon a commodity that had to compete in a protected country and laying it upon those that were admitted to the markets of other countries free from any protection or discrimination of any kind.

Mr. FRANCIS. That was true when we had infant industries. But does not the gentleman know that to-day nearly all of our factories are operated by trusts, and does the gentleman wish to give them free raw material with which to exploit the people further?

Mr. MACON. I certainly do not; but I want to give them free raw material, so that the compensatory tariff can be taken off of the manufactured product, so as to destroy an important part of the power of manufacturers to organize themselves into trusts. I tried to illustrate that a few moments ago. If you give the woolman 20 per cent on his raw wool, he sells it to the manufacturer with that 20 per cent added to it, and the manufacturer must then be given 20 per cent in order to compensate him for the 20 per cent tariff that he must pay the raw-material man; and then, in order to put him on a tariff equality with the raw-material man, he must be given another 20 per cent, which makes the tariff at least three times as great as it would be if the raw-material man was given no tariff protection.

Mr. FRANCIS. That is absolutely correct. But suppose the American Woolen Co. controls the price of wool and the price of the manufactured product, are you not, by giving that company free wool, giving it an advantage by which it can exploit the people?

Mr. MACON. I think not. If the compensatory tariff is taken off of the finished product of the woolen manufacturer and he is only given 20 per cent on the finished product to enable him to compete with the manufacturers of foreign countries, it will vastly lessen his opportunity to control the prices of wool and woolens, and hence will be less able to exploit the people than he is now. I would be in favor of putting a slight duty on the raw materials of this country for the purpose of raising revenue, if it could be shown that in exporting them to foreign countries they would be barred by a tariff; but such is not the case, and hence I insist that the producer of raw materials in this country ought not to ask more than a free world-wide market for his products; but it is different with the manufacturers of this country. When they send their products to Germany they are met by a tariff wall that they must surmount before they can enter into competition with the manufacturers of that country, and hence, as stated a few moments ago, I can see some reason why they should be given some assistance in their effort to mount that wall by way of protection against the importations of the manufacturers of Germany into this country as long as we must raise a part of our revenue by the tariff. If we were to enact a law allowing the manufacturers of all other countries to enter our ports free of duty while other countries put an embargo upon the importation of our manufacturers, we would destroy our manufacturing industries as well as destroy our opportunity of raising a part of our revenue for revenue purposes only.

Other countries levy no tariff upon the raw materials produced in this country, and hence the raw-material man has no tariff wall to surmount when he goes to foreign countries with his products.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACON. I will.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman from Arkansas, he would levy a tariff on the manufactured article of wool in order that the manufacturer in this country might be able to surmount the tariff wall of other countries?

Mr. MACON. Yes; I said that that and the revenue-only feature of the tariff was the only excuse for levying a tariff at all upon woolen manufactures.

Mr. GARNER. You would levy a tax solely for the purpose of making the manufacturer of this country prosperous enough to surmount the tariff wall of foreign countries?

Mr. MACON. No; I would levy a tariff on his products for the purpose of raising revenue and, incidentally, for the purpose of enabling him to compete with the manufacturers of foreign countries.

Mr. GARNER. You would levy a tax in order to make him prosperous?

Mr. MACON. I would not. I would levy it for the purposes just stated and not for the purpose of making him prosperous at all. But your raw-material man does not need a tariff to enable him to compete in foreign countries, and the gentleman from Texas knows that perfectly well.

Mr. GARNER. I thought the gentleman from Arkansas took the position, the Democratic position, that the levying of a tax was for the purpose of raising revenue and not for the purpose of enabling manufacturers to sell in a foreign country.

Mr. MACON. It has been the policy of the Democratic Party at all times to levy a tariff for revenue only, and, inasmuch as the tariff must be laid on some things to raise revenue, it does not appear to be entirely out of place to lay a sufficient amount of it upon the manufactured product to enable our manufacturers to compete with the manufacturers of foreign countries as well as to raise revenue. It is necessary for this country to maintain manufacturing establishments in order to give employment to labor as well as to make use of the raw materials that are produced in the country, and when a tariff is laid upon the manufactured product for the purpose of raising revenue and, incidentally, enabling the manufacturer to compete with his competitor in foreign countries that put a tariff embargo on our manufactures, I do not see any reason why that should not be done as long as our Government is so organized as that it is necessary for us to get some of our revenue through the customhouse.

Mr. GARNER. If we could devise a system of taxation by which we could run the Government without an import duty, would the gentleman still insist that manufacturers should have a protection in order that they might sell their goods in a foreign market?

Mr. MACON. If we could lay a tax, like an income tax, a tax upon property, or a tax upon luxuries, sufficient to support the Government, thereby relieving the unfortunate class of our citizens of the tax burden that now rests upon them, I would be a free trader from stem to stern. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. Representing, as I do, a large woolgrowing constituency in Ohio, I would like to ask the gentleman's views as to the effect on that industry if you abolish the duty entirely upon the raw wool; that is, what the gentleman's views are as to the effect it will have upon the sheep-raising industry in this country?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants my honest view about it, I will say that any industry in this country of unequaled soil and climate and superior people, that is not hampered by governmental action, that can not subsist in a field of honest competition with the products of foreign countries, ought to perish. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] said in his speech, a few moments ago, that some of the membership of the House had stated that the woolen industry was a dying one in Ohio, it flashed through my mind that if, with the excellent opportunities we have in this country, consisting of friendly climatic conditions, diversity of soil, and a matchless citizenship, a continent that has been given greater advantages by the God of Creation than those given to any other nation on the face of the earth, possessing advantages and opportunities that enable us to produce everything from tropical fruit to polar bear, an industry could not succeed without being protected against an honest competition with the industries of countries less favored than ours, that the industry ought to die, and it ought to do it quick. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHARP. That being so, and the wool industry perishing from this country, does the gentleman think that if our manufacturers had to depend for their supply upon the foreign-grown wool they would be able to get their raw material any cheaper than they do now?

Mr. MACON. I think they would. My information is, according to the claims of the woolgrowers themselves, we have about 22,000 persons engaged in the production of wool. That number multiplied by the size of an ordinary family would give us 110,000 people depending upon the wool industry in this country for subsistence. Does the gentleman from Ohio think that it is fair to unduly tax the 92,000,000 people of this country in order that 110,000 of our citizens should have additional compensation for their product? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the gentleman says, I will state that his information is clearly off, as there are three times that number of woolgrowers in the State of Ohio alone.

Mr. MACON. Three times 22,000 in Ohio, alone?

Mr. SHARP. Yes.

Mr. MACON. Then my information is badly awry, but I would like to have the gentleman show me his figures on that before I accept his statement as true.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the industry of raising children is getting to be a dying industry on account of insufficient warm clothing in infancy in many parts of the United States?

Mr. MACON. I think the gentleman is entirely correct about that, if reports are true.

Mr. SIMS. And as between sheep and children my colleague is on the side of the children?

Mr. MACON. Every time, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it would not make any difference in the gentleman's reasoning or conclusion whether there were three times 22,000 sheep growers in Ohio or not. If there are 102,000 or 500,000, the gentleman's reasoning would apply just the same.

Mr. MACON. Yes; it would apply just the same. I do not think anyone ought to ask Congress to get behind their business and boost it by protecting it against the honest acts of his fellows. To put raw wool on the free list would reduce the price of woolens, according to estimates made by statisticians, at least 20 per cent on the manufactured products. What a magnificent saving that would be to the American people!

Mr. SHARP. Do you think that we would get that saving?

Mr. MACON. I do. It is estimated that the pending bill, revising Schedule K, will save to the American people more than half a billion dollars, and if raw wool was placed upon the free list we could save them another half billion. Would not that be a goodly thing for the legislators of this country to do for the people they represent, who must necessarily have woolens to wear in order that they may be comfortable?

I have heard quite a number of arguments here in favor of free lumber, it being insisted that lumber was a necessity because of the fact that the people must have homes to live in. But, sir, I insist that it is more necessary to have woolen clothes free from taxation than it is lumber, for trees during a considerable period of the year could not be cut and hauled to the mills and manufactured into lumber and put into homes unless those who did the work had clothes upon their backs to keep them from freezing while they were doing it.

A demand for a tariff, except for the sole and express purpose of raising revenue with which to support the Government, can no more be justified than can any other covetous act of one desiring to possess property justly belonging to another. Self-interest appears to be a strong factor in the matter of controlling the actions of men.

I remember to have read a few years ago about a Scottish innkeeper who did a thriving business by sheltering robbers in his inn during the daytime. They would go out at night and rob all persons found upon the highway, as well as rob the homes of the community in which they were operating, and after pilfering everything they could conveniently get away with they would return to the inn just before dawn and remain until nighttime came again, and then they would proceed to ply their nefarious avocation. Finally their acts became so notorious that officers were sent in search of them, and they were making things so warm that the robbers took to the hills and did not return to the inn; whereupon the business of the innkeeper began to decrease and his self-interest caused him to immediately petition the King, requesting that his constables and other officers be stopped from making search for the robbers that frequented his inn, giving as a reason therefor that they were interfering with his—the innkeeper's—business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, I want to say to you in all seriousness that the man who asks protection for his business, knowing that if his request is granted that his fellows will be hindered in the legitimate prosecution of their business in the open and honest markets of the world, occupies about the same selfish attitude that the Scottish innkeeper did when he petitioned that the robbers be permitted to prosecute their nefarious business in order that his business might prosper.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. Prior to the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law two years ago we had a duty of 15 per cent on hides, a duty very similar to the one now proposed on raw wool. It was argued then that if that duty was taken off and hides were placed on the free list, it would save the people who purchase shoes several millions of dollars. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not it is not true that since the 15 per cent was taken off of hides that shoes have not been lower in price, but, in fact, have been higher in price even than they were before; and whether or not the manufacturers who received the benefit of what the gentleman calls "free raw material" did not take all the benefit themselves and give none of it to the consumer; and whether or not if this duty of 20 per cent was taken off of wool and the duty continued on the manufactured product the manufacturer would not receive the benefit and the children the gentleman speaks of would receive very little benefit of it?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, time will not permit me to answer the gentleman's question, because I would have to enter into a wide field of conditions in order to determine whether or not his conclusions are right. I know I do not pay any more for my shoes than I did two years ago. As well as I remember, the gentleman voted for free hides that grow upon the back of cattle, just as wool grows upon the back of sheep. The production of hides is just as much an industry as the production of wool, and I do not think that it lies within the gentleman's mouth to now contend for a tariff upon wool because it is some one's industry. I can not understand how the gentleman could be in favor of protecting the woolen man's industry while he was in favor of the cattleman's raw material being placed upon the free list.

Mr. ADAIR. I am asking what the result has been, in the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. MACON. I have not the time to go into an extended explanation of the matter, to go into all of the conditions, as an intelligent answer of the gentleman's question would require would consume all of my limited time. Various things cause prices to rise. A few years ago we were told that the tariff on wheat in the Dingley bill produced dollar wheat, but we know that the failure of the wheat crop in foreign countries caused the rise. I thought the gentleman, like myself, was in favor of free raw materials. I am sure I have seen him vote for free raw materials in several instances, and I was of the opinion that if he would do that in one instance he would do it in all.

Mr. ADAIR. I might say this, that the more I study this question the less I am inclined to a free-list bill. It is pretty hard to say what is raw material and what is the finished product.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman's statement implies that the more he studies the tariff question the nearer he comes to being a protectionist. I am just the other way.

Mr. ADAIR. Not exactly.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the gentleman said about it being hard to say what is raw material and what is finished product, I will say that raw material has been intelligently defined to be "the lowest and crudest form in which a commodity enters into commerce." That means when wool is baled and ready for market; cotton, when first placed upon the market in the form of lint; hides, in the crudest form in which they are offered for sale; corn, in the condition it was when taken from the stalk, and so forth.

I insist that raw material is not a proper subject for tariff taxation for revenue purposes, because every cent levied upon the raw material is compounded several times before it reaches the consumer, thereby assuming gigantic proportions by the time the finished product is ready for use.

Mr. Chairman, the excuse given by the authors of the pending bill for putting a tax on raw wool is, that because of the depleted condition of the Public Treasury the taxing of wool became a revenue necessity. The resolution upon the subject adopted by the Democratic caucus sets forth the reasons for its action in putting a tariff of 20 per cent on wool better than I can do, so I will let it speak for itself. It reads as follows:

Resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy, but in view of the Democratic platform demand for a gradual reduction of the tariff and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury, a result of Republican extravagance, a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

I think the two main facts set forth in that resolution can be clearly controverted. First, it is insisted that the adoption of the resolution was not to be construed as "an abandonment of any Democratic policy."

Mr. Chairman, if Democratic platform declarations and organized actions of Democratic lawmakers in all of the Congresses that have convened in the United States for nearly three-quarters of a century against a tax on raw material can be construed to be Democratic policies, then the declaration of the action of the present Ways and Means Committee in putting a tax on raw wool is a contradiction of that part of the caucus resolution which declares that it is not to be construed as "an abandonment of any Democratic policy." I do not see how the committee could have done anything that would have been a more complete abandonment of the Democratic policy on the tariff question or a more complete turning of the face of our party in the direction of the doctrine of Republican protectionism than they did when they put a tariff on raw wool.

Second, there can be no necessity for levying a tax upon the necessaries of life until after every opportunity to raise revenue by taxing luxuries has been exhausted. Woolen clothes are absolutely necessary for the laboring people of this country, while silks, diamonds, and rubber used in the manufacture of automobiles for joy riders and the crazy rich to exploit themselves in, as they did in Indianapolis a few weeks ago in a series of wild races that left death and destruction in their wake, are luxuries, and ought in all fairness be taxed for revenue purposes before a single cent of tax is laid upon wool. Statisticians tell us that if the tax was taken off of wool it would reduce our revenues about $15,000,000. Now, in order to meet that deficit, let us see how easy it would be to make it up by putting a tariff of 20 per cent on the luxuries that I have just mentioned. Last year $67,000,000 worth of raw silk was admitted into this country free of duty. A 20 per cent duty upon that would have brought us $13,400,000 of revenue, nearly enough within itself to have wiped out the deficit caused by taking 20 per cent off of raw wool. Over $100,000,000 worth of raw rubber, used to manufacture automobiles, and so forth, was admitted free of duty last year. A 20 per cent duty on that would have raised more than $20,000,000, and quite a number of millions could have been added to our revenue by a 20 per cent tariff on the diamonds that were admitted free. Thus it can be seen that it was not absolutely necessary to place a tariff of 20 per cent on wool in order to meet revenue deficiencies caused by the extravagance of the Republican Party. None of the articles I have mentioned are necessary for either the comfort or happiness of the toiling people of this country, and hence are proper subjects of taxation according to the declarations of Democratic platforms.

On the other hand, woolens are worn by the humblest of our citizens. I am informed that miners, who delve deep into the earth from one year's end to the other in order to eke out a meager existence, are compelled to wear woolen clothes to protect themselves from the inflammable dangers that always attend them while at their work. It is hard for me, as a Democrat, to understand why the gigantic Rubber Trust, headed by ex-Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, should be allowed to receive its raw material free of duty, to be used in manufacturing pleasure machines, while woolen manufacturers are required to pay a tariff of 20 per cent upon the raw materials that they manufacture into woolens to be worn by miners, sewing women, and hod carriers.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my last Democratic authority for placing raw materials upon the free list. It is taken from a speech made by William J. Bryan, in 1892, while a Member of Congress, a speech which, in my judgment, has not been surpassed before or since as an argument in favor of reforming the tariff by placing raw materials on the free list. I will read it:

It also takes away entirely those specific or compensatory duties which were added to the ad valorem rates to enable the manufacturers to transfer to the back of the consumer the burden which a tariff on raw material places on the manufacturer. The reason why I believe in putting raw material on the free list is because any tax imposed on raw material must at last be taken from the consumer of the manufactured article.

You can compose no tax for the benefit of the producer of the raw material which does not find its way through the various forms of manufactured products and at last press with accumulated weight upon the person who uses the finished product. Another reason why raw material should be upon the free list is because that is the only method by which one business can be favored without injury to another. We are not, in that case, imposing a tax for the benefit of the manufacturer, but we are simply saying to the manufacturer, "We will not impose any burden upon you." When we give to the manufacturer free raw material and free machinery, we give to him, I think, all the encouragement which people acting under a free government like ours can legitimately give to a free people.

Mr. Chairman, if that is not Democracy, I beg some one, in God's name, to tell me what it is. But we are told that Mr. Bryan has no right to suggest anything to this Congress about legislation; that when he does, he is meddling. I hold no brief to speak for the gentleman and am not fortunate enough to have an intimate acquaintance with him. I have met him in a formal way on a few occasions, but I have heard and read much of him, and in that way have come to know him to be one of the ablest, cleanest, and most upright characters that it has ever been my good fortune to meet. As an officeholder his career was short, only having served two terms in this House, but in that time his superior ability and splendid statesmanship enabled him to make a name and fame for himself that no one occupying a similar position for the same length of time has been able to make for himself since the foundation of our Government. His clean life has been an incentive and encouragement to every ambitious American youth to live a better life, and his wise and able utterances and noble actions have given him a world-wide fame that no other private citizen has ever enjoyed.

The corrupt interests of this country have been doing everything in their power to crush and drive him from public life ever since the purity and integrity of the man was known to be genuine and true. They have had "two-by-four" critics nagging at his heels ever since he sprang into renown, but his lofty life, noble purposes, and splendid statesmanship have kept him so high above them that they have been unable to place a single stain upon his good name. They have assaulted him upon every side with coarse, brutal vituperation and villification that would have caused any other man to have hurled their infamous criticisms back at them in kindred language, but in defending himself against their unjust criticisms he has not uttered a single word that could not have been used in the most sacred pulpit in all our land.

Without wealth to attract the silly social to his feet or patronage to allure hungry place hunters to his shrine, he has created for himself a popularity that has fairly rung around the civilized world and has made for himself a name far greater than that of any other private citizen of his or any other time.

Several years ago I had the pleasure of attending a reception given to Mr. Bryan at Louisville, Ky., upon his return from abroad, and in reaching the hotel the committee in charge of him had to proceed through several miles of streets that were packed from the brick walls on either side to a point in the center of the street where the conveyances could hardly move without pressing the toes of persons near by. It was a scene wonderful to behold, and to see a private citizen attracting such attention and receiving such applause as was being heaped upon him upon that occasion was a revelation to me, and I so stated the fact to a correspondent of the St. Louis Republic, who was riding in the conveyance with me, and he replied that it was wonderful; but he said that it was much more wonderful to see him attracting the same kind of attention and applause in foreign countries. He said that he was detailed by the Republic to travel with Mr. Bryan in Europe for five months as its special correspondent, and that it made no difference whether they were in London, Paris, Berlin, or any of the other great metropolitan cities of the Old World he was received by immense crowds and with much applause. While on that trip he was received and entertained by royalty on more occasions than one, made many speeches, and received much applause, and he came out of it all the same plain, everyday Democrat that he was when he bade his native shore good-by, and he insulted no one while he was doing it. What other private citizen, according to the history of the world, has been able to do as much?

The pity of it is, Mr. Chairman, that a fellow citizen, who has done so much for the plain people, who has done so much to better the manners and elevate the morals and statesmanship of his country, a man who is the peer of anyone who has lived with him or before him, should have carping critics eternally nagging at his heels; critics that will compare with him in manners as the fox fire that shines by night compares with the bright noonday sun in brilliancy of light, will compare with him in intellect and statesmanship as the pace of the snail compares with that of the fleetest charger that ever gave mount to Arabian knight, and in morals will compare with him as the water that percolates through the barnyard drain compares in purity with the salt-purified waters of the mighty deep.

We all know that he is not an angel, but we know that he has been one of the greatest apostles that ever went forth to proclaim justice and right between man and man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask in all sincerity who has done more in this age of the world's progress for the betterment of the conditions of our splendid country than Mr. Bryan? Mr. Roosevelt's popularity is but a reflection from the popularity of Bryan, for all of his progressive ideas were first possessed and proclaimed by Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The legislation that has been enacted at this session of Congress, of which so many Members have boasted and which has received the unstinted applause of the American people, was first advocated by Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For 16 years he has gone forth preaching the doctrine of righteousness and justice and proclaiming against special privileges of every kind until the minds of the people have been so crystallized upon the subjects that he has been advocating that they have sent us here as their representatives to put into law the declarations of that great and good man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And yet, with all that he has done, when he opens his mouth to suggest a well-defined Democratic principle concerning a great economic question pending before Congress, he is denounced by some of the Members of this House as being an officious meddler. Has it come to that, Mr. Chairman, that a great Democrat is denied the privilege of expressing his opinion upon a great Democratic question pending before Congress? Have we reached a point where a man who has done so much for his country as W. J. Bryan has done dare not express his opinion, to be accepted for what it is worth by Congressmen, without being condemned for doing so?

Mr. Bryan has just as much right to his opinion about the legislation to be enacted by Congress as the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee or any other Member of the House, and to deny him that privilege would be a denial of free speech in a country that has unfalteringly contended for that sacred privilege from its foundation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When Members of Congress become so self-opinionated or so large in their own estimation as to become offended when any of our fellow citizens suggest the propriety of the enactment or nonenactment of certain legislation by Congress, it is time for them to be retired to the private walks of life. The humblest citizens of our country have a perfect right to freely suggest what their servants shall or shall not do when it comes to legislating for them.

I saw it stated in several papers immediately after Mr. Bryan made his recent declaration in favor of placing raw wool on the free list that some of the Members of the House who had favored free raw wool before he made his statement were against the proposition after reading what he said about it. I hope the newspaper reports of the matter were not true, for I can not understand how a man large enough to represent 190,000 people in Congress could be so small as to turn against a cardinal Democratic tenet that was in existence before Mr. Bryan was born simply because that gentleman saw fit to express himself in favor of it—a party principle that was being advocated by Members of the House before he declared his views upon the pending bill. It may be statesmanship for a Member of Congress to change his position upon a great party question because some one takes sides with him about it, but, to my mind, it is the smallest statesmanship that could be defined by man, and I have but little respect for those who possess it.

It has been stated that Mr. Bryan was seeking to destroy the harmony of his party in Congress, but I do not believe it. There are certain kinds of harmony, however, that ought to be destroyed, whether in Congress or out of it. Political harmony should not exist anywhere at the enormous cost of the sacrifice of great political policies, and I for one am ready to do everything in my power to cast the harmony of my party to the four winds of the earth if in order to retain it I would have to turn my back upon the principles of the Democratic Party on the tariff and my face toward the protection policies of the Republican Party.

Mr. Chairman, in order to show the great sacrifice that would be demanded in order to preserve certain kinds of harmony, I will say that there has not been a day or an hour since the fall of the angels that there could not have been absolute harmony between hell and heaven if the saints of heaven had been willing to yield to the sinful influences of the demons of hell; and there has not been a day or an hour since the fall of Adam when the virgin and the streetwalker could not have been in happy harmony if the virgin had surrendered her sweet virtues to the impure thoughts and infamous suggestions of the streetwalker; there has not been a day or an hour since the sacred pulpit of the religion of our God was established upon the earth that its occupants and the dive keeper could not have gone hand in hand down the pathway of peaceful harmony if gentlemen of the cloth had been willing to partake of the vices and adopt the habits of the dive keeper. I love harmony, Mr. Chairman, whether in church, business, politics, or society, but when it comes to paying such prices as those indicated in the enumeration just made in order that it might exist, I say, to the winds with "harmony."

I regret very much that anything has been said by Democrats to cause anyone to believe that Mr. Bryan's counsel was no longer coveted by the party. I, sir, as one of its humblest members, unhesitatingly state that whenever it becomes too good or too bad to need or desire the counsel of men of Mr. Bryan's stripe that it will be too good or too bad for me, as the case may be. It has been said that Mr. Bryan is a dictator, but that I strenuously deny. For one to be a dictator he must occupy some position of authority. To accuse Bryan of dictatorship because he has declared for free raw wool may have the unfortunate tendency to confirm the conjecture that he who makes such an acquisition may have fallen under the influence of the protection interests of the country. I hope the charge was only a careless expression caused by a momentary eruption of mind; but charges of a political dictatorship against Mr. Bryan are suspicious, and their proper analysis will force the conclusion that that kind of warfare upon him originated with the plutocratic elements of the country. No man can be a political dictator who does not hold a public office, a party chairmanship, or who does not belong to any inside clique, or has no special business interest or affiliations, or who can not pull a single secret wire in politics, or who has no political or other power except the confidence which an overwhelming majority of the American people repose in his true fidelity. Bryan's political power consists solely in the well-earned confidence that he enjoys beyond that accorded any other citizen of the United States. He no longer even enjoys the doubtful power of a possible candidate for the Presidency, for he has distinctly declared that he will not again be a candidate for that office. It is inevitable that the power of such a man as Bryan shall always be dreaded by corrupt politicians, but they make a great mistake when they attempt to injure this gallant patriot by unwisely declaring him to be a dictator or a boss.

It has been stated that it was not through the efforts of Mr. Bryan that the Democrats are in control of the House, and that those who won the victory accepted the challenge he made when he declared himself for free raw wool. Mr. Chairman, he who says that Mr. Bryan had nothing to do with the election of the Sixty-second Congress either exposes his own ignorance upon the subject or deliberately misrepresents facts in regard to it. I remember to have read a speech delivered by Mr. Bryan in Indianapolis last fall in the interest of Senator KERN and Mr. KORBLY, in answer to a speech delivered in that city one week before by Theodore Roosevelt in behalf of the candidacy of Senator Beveridge for reelection. No abler or more effective plea was ever made to an audience for Democratic supremacy or for Democratic candidates than Mr. Bryan made upon that occasion, and I am advised that he made speeches of like import in all parts of Indiana, as well as in other States, and to my mind those speeches had more to do with the election of the Sixty-second Congress than those made by any score of speakers who took part in the campaign. I call upon the Representatives from Indiana to repudiate what I say if they can truthfully say that Mr. Bryan had nothing to do with the election of 12 Democrats to 1 Republican to this House from that State.

I remember among other things said by him in the speech made in Indianapolis, that was accorded wide circulation throughout the country, that the Sixty-second Congress would be asked to reduce the expenditures of this Government, thereby lightening the burdens of the people, and he said that they would need Mr. KERN in the Senate and Mr. KORBLY in the House to help carry out that reform; that the Sixty-second Congress would be called upon to adopt a resolution amending the Constitution so as to provide for the election of United States Senators by the people, thereby taking it out of the hands of corruptionists, such as those that compelled the election of a certain Senator from Illinois; and he said they would need Mr. KERN in the Senate to vote for that resolution and Mr. KORBLY in the House to vote for it. He said that the Sixty-second Congress would be called upon to pass a bill providing for the publication of all expenditures and contributions before election that were used or made for the election of Presidents and Vice Presidents, so that the people would know before they cast their ballot what interests made contributions and proposed to control the elections in this country; and he said that they would need Mr. KERN in the Senate and Mr. KORBLY in the House to vote for that proposition. Mr. Chairman, I might go on and name other great measures that this wonderful Democrat stood there and appealed to the voters in behalf of and urged them to cast their ballots for the Democratic nominees in order that they might be carried out, but time will not permit me to do so. I will, therefore, bring the matter to a close by asking if any of you think that Mr. Bryan had nothing to do with the election of the Sixty-second Congress? I do not believe there is a man upon this floor that will subscribe to such a belief.

Oh, Mr. Chairman, what has Bryan done that he should receive strictures from anyone? It is true that he has been an unsuccessful nominee for President three different times, but in all of those contests he came out of them as clean as when he went into them. No man can point his finger at a single speck or spot that he made upon his political record in either of those contests.

When this country declared war against Spain because of its inhumanities to those of its subjects at our door he promptly offered his services and his life, if necessary, to maintain his country's honor.

It is true that Mr. Bryan has not in every instance represented the policies of our party as I understood them, but he is so much my superior in intelligence and statecraft that I do not know whether I am entitled to take issue with him upon them or not. He at one time favored Government ownership of railroads. I was opposed to the proposition, but who can tell whether he was right and I wrong. Nobody will be able to tell who was right until we see whether the gigantic railroad combinations of this country are going to respect the laws enacted by Congress regulating them or whether the courts are going to see that they are enforced. But why complain of Mr. Bryan for differing with his party on that question when we do not complain of Democrats in this House who, only a few months ago, advocated upon this floor the creation of a Tariff Board, to be appointed by a partisan President, to gather such facts and figures concerning the tariff as might be desired by the party of the President that appointed the board? If Mr. Bryan's position upon the railroad proposition was undemocratic, certainly the position taken by Democratic Congressmen in advocating the creation of a Tariff Board was undemocratic. It is true that he opposed the election of the Democratic nominee for governor in his State during the last campaign, but why should we complain of that when we accept in the best of fellowship certain Democratic Members of this House who bolted the Democratic nominee for President in 1896. In the one instance only one office in a State was involved; in the other the chief officers of the Nation and the vast horde of inferior officers to be appointed by the President were involved.

Let us be generous and just with Mr. Bryan as well as with those Members of the House who turned their backs upon their party nominee when every economic interest of the Nation and the life of the party, almost, depended upon the result of that election.

Mr. Bryan has been the greatest expounder of the principles of humanity this country has had within my lifetime, and no one can truthfully say, I care not how low and degraded he may be, that that illustrious political knight, that splendid advocate of manhood, that true apostle of righteousness and justice between man and man, has ever lowered the standard of any cause for which he has fought, whether making his fight for them in this country or anywhere else in the wide, wide world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Alabama yield one minute to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, replying to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] as to the estimate of the number of sheep growers in the United States, I have to say that the last census report, just issued, shows that there are at present 3,907,055 sheep in the State of Ohio. I have no means of knowing how many individual sheep owners there are in Ohio, but from my own knowledge of the sheep owners in my district, estimating their flocks to be 100 each, it would indicate that there are substantially 40,000 sheep owners in the State of Ohio, and I think that estimate is fairly accurate, at least small enough.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] with regard to Mr. Bryan have pleased me very much. I think he has paid to that great leader a just panegyric, and I want to say to him that I have a letter here from Mr. Bryan on the subject of this wool bill, a part of which I propose to read in a few minutes.

If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has not left the Hall, I should like to compliment him upon his speech. He believes the tariff on wool should be reduced, and yet is afraid to have us do it. He has made the best of a bad case. Having really nothing whatever to say in defense of his position, he has said it in several ways, each one more graceful than the last, and taken an hour and a half to do it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Two contentions of his, however, may well be corrected in passing—first, as to the authority on which we are depending for our action in urging the immediate passage of the Underwood bill. Permit me to say that it is not upon the opinion of any professor of political economy that we are relying, but upon the well-considered and definite authority given to us by the American people and dated in November last, that we propose to pass this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As to the main contention of the gentleman, in which he admits there are defects in Schedule K, but does not think these ought to be corrected now, I am reminded very much of that immortal dictum of Daniel Webster, who is said to have produced a document by which to govern his financial conduct. The first rule was, "Never pay any bill to-day." [Applause and laughter.]

I want to call your attention not to the technical side of the tariff, because this aspect has been fully considered by other speakers who have preceded me. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] has presented the subject exhaustively from the point of view of those who believe in a tariff for revenue only, and produced a speech which I think will go down into the history of tariff legislation as a classic. And my colleague from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] has given to the House a great deal of practical information with regard to this schedule from the point of view of the manufacturer. Other gentlemen have ably contributed in exposing the false pretension that a high tariff on wool is necessary for the welfare of the growers of sheep and the manufacturers of woolens, and shown how detrimental the operations of the present tariff are to the country in general.

The aspects upon which I wish briefly to speak are:

First, that as a practical tariff measure, this bill is most admirably suited to the present condition of the country and approved by the country as a whole.

Second, that it is an earnest and promise to the country of the temperate and well-considered legislation that may be expected in the future from the Democratic Party upon all tariff and financial subjects. [Applause.]

It has been the custom of the Republican Party in the past to so write the tariffs on wool that they can not be easily understood. Each section is so confused with ad valorem, specific, and countervailing duties that only a customhouse expert can compute the amount of tariff that any article bears. This bill is so simple that the wayfaring man, even although he has been a fool for a great many years, can read and understand. In every section he can tell just what the amount of duty is going to be. It is an honest bill. It does not have in it any of those jokers, under the table or up the sleeve, that is contained in Schedule K of the Payne bill. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] And it is a wise bill, as any bill is a wise bill which comes about through the sincere endeavor of any majority party to carry out the wishes of the people through consultation of all the members of that party. In preparing this bill the views of every Democratic Member of this House have been taken into consideration, and the result is a composite judgment of the whole party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not suppose that in any of the tariff legislation that has been before this House for many years there has been any bill that has had so much careful thought given it and upon the preparation of which the ideas of individual Members have been given such careful consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The result is that this bill now has the approbation of this House and will, in my judgment, secure not only the unanimous vote of the Democratic side, but also 30 or 40 votes from you gentlemen across the aisle, and will therefore pass this House by practically a two-thirds majority, a greater majority than has been accorded to by any tariff bill in many decades. It seems to me there can be little doubt in the minds of any here that this bill meets the approbation of the country as a whole, and upon this point I have some information to offer which has been freshly secured from my own district, the northern part of New York City. My view of the duties of a Representative in Congress is that he is not sent here to pose as a leader of thought, to enunciate abstruse theories for the country to follow, but that he shall find out the course of conduct that his constituents wish him to follow and vote as they direct.

Endeavoring to learn the views of my district about this wool bill, I sent out to my constituents, as soon as the bill was introduced, several thousand letters and asked them to express to me their wishes. These letters were sent to Democrats, Republicans, Socialists, and to men of all shades of thought, and from the hundreds of replies I wish to read you a symposium. My district is the largest in population in the city of New York, and the views of its residents are doubtless the same as those of the residents of other districts in the city and in the State of New York as a whole. What the voters in my district say is very much what the voters of the State of New York will say. Of course, there is not time, nor will it be necessary, to read you all the replies, but I have made a selection which fairly represents all the trades and occupations.

Listen first to a letter from a manufacturer of ready-made and custom clothes, Mr. G. N. Vincent, who has several stores in New York City and who does an extensive business. He says:

NEW YORK, June 12, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. AYRES: Supplementing my letter to you of a few days ago, let me say that I am much pleased with the action of the House of Representatives in relation to the wool tariff. I am a manufacturer of and dealer in clothing and, as you know, I have always been a Republican; but I have become convinced that free raw wool will be an advantage to the United States.

We have already a small export business in ready-made clothes which is maintained because of the excellence of our manufacturing. If the basis of good woolens could be added to the perfection of our make it would, in my opinion, increase greatly our export trade. I believe, too, that you are right in making this reduction of the wool tariff a gradual reduction. Such a process will not interrupt business, but will stimulate it.

Yours, truly, G. N. VINCENT.

Next allow me to read a letter from a director of Tiffany & Co., one of the great firms of silversmiths. The writer until last fall has not found himself able to support our ticket, at least not for many years. He says:

NEW YORK, June 14, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. AYRES: Let me congratulate you and the Democratic Members of the House on the sensible action taken by them in relation to the wool tariff.

The independent voters of New York City are now beginning to realize that the Democratic Party is doing the right thing and can be trusted with the control of the Government if it carries out the plans which have been mapped out. With best wishes, I am,

Yours, very truly,

H. H. TREADWELL,
132 West One hundred and eighty-third Street.

Now, a civil engineer from the Bronx, a man of great experience and ability:

NEW YORK CITY, June 12, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter asking me for an expression of an opinion on the question of the wool schedule now before Congress is received, and I beg to say that I do not feel that I am sufficiently informed on this particular subject to give advice as to how you should act on the pending legislation. However, I would say that I do not believe in too radical changes in tariff schedules, but rather that reductions should be made conservatively along the lines of the things the people wear and eat, first, and not so as to work serious injury to the labor interests of our country. I believe in reduction, but think it should be done gradually. * * * Free wool would be desirable, but I do not think we have yet reached the situation where it could be safely established.

Very truly, yours, JOSIAH A. BRIGGS.

Here's another letter from a dealer in clothing:

NEW YORK, June 15, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES, M. C.

DEAR SIR: I believe in free raw materials, with a duty on the manufactured articles to cover the difference in price of labor, but no high tariff to allow the manufacturers to charge the extra high prices we are paying now. Of course, ample time should be given everybody to adjust their affairs to suit any changes made.

The present tariff only allows a few manufacturers to pocket enormous profits at the expense of the masses.

Yours, truly, JAS. R. GAFFNEY, 2316 Grand Avenue, Bronx.

The president of the Borough of the Bronx was elected two years ago by a combination of Republicans with the Independence League, and he is a man of much experience and ability. He writes as follows:

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Although I have been an active low-tariff advocate for years, I believe in a gradual reduction rather than an abrupt change, because it allows people time to adjust themselves to the change. A bill providing, for instance, for an annual reduction of 5 per cent illustrates the principle.

CYRUS C. MILLER,
President Borough of the Bronx.

Here is the expression of a gentleman who is engaged in the import trade:

NEW YORK, June 13, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 12th instant in re Schedule K of the tariff, and in reply I beg to say that I am in favor of a reasonable reduction of the duties in general, and especially on such products which, through the effect of prohibitive duties, are placed beyond competition. In my opinion, duties should represent the difference between home and foreign prices, and I have no doubt that sufficient revenue would be available for the needs of the Government by a reduction of the tariff.

Thanking you for the courtesy and hoping that you will see your way clear to vote for a reduction of the tariff in general, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES N. HOCK,
2328 Morris Avenue.

Here is a frank expression of opinion from a workingman, and a very intelligent one:

NEW YORK, June 12, 1911.

Mr. STEVEN B. AYRES.

DEAR SIR: I am very much in favor of the bill for reduction of the tariff on wool. I can say for myself and 100 of my friends who work by the hour that such a bill would greatly benefit our families and our pocketbooks, which are limited. Furthermore, I think that a Representative should take into consideration the people who elected him (the wage earners) and try to influence legislation so the cost of living to them will be within their means. * * *

WILLIAM E. WICKS,
1256 Nelson Avenue.

The secretary of the Rational Tariff Revision League writes as follows:

RATIONAL TARIFF REVISION LEAGUE,
New York, June 14, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am one of your constituents, and have read with interest your note in regard to the proposed reduction of the customs duties on raw wool and wool manufactures. I am heartily in favor of the measure, and may say that my opinion is backed by a considerable study of the question, reenforced by discussion with importers and manufacturers of woolen goods.

* * * * * * *

Yours, very truly, GRAHAM MCADAM.

May I now call your attention for a moment to the opinion of one of the justices of our Supreme Court of the State of New York. This man, I know, has given the tariff very considerable attention, yet note how conservatively he writes of his information upon this subject:

SUPREME COURT, CITY OF NEW YORK,
June 14, 1911.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have not given the question sufficient examination to enable me to offer reasons in detail, but I am of the opinion that a very considerable reduction of the present tariff on wool will operate to the advantage of a vast majority of the people of the United States without injustice to those interested in maintaining the tariff at present high rates.

Very truly, yours, JOHN J. BRADY, Justice.

These are the views of a representative of the hardware and cutlery trade. He believes that turn about is fair play:

JUNE 14, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES.

DEAR SIR: Make the tariff on wool 10 per cent; make lumber free. On the balance a tariff for revenue only, as propounded by Samuel J. Tilden. We Democrats voted for you, now please vote as instructed by us.

WALTER R. GRAY,
2051 Anthony Avenue, Bronx.

The gentleman whose letter is given next is a fair representative of those voters who believe in the moderate protection of our home industries:

NEW YORK CITY, June 13, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter to-day, and I must say I was both pleased and surprised, as it is the first of its kind I ever received from any Representative. I am in favor of a law reducing the duties on all raw wool, the manufacturing to be done in this country and keep our woolen mills working.

WILLIAM DELANEY,
32 West Fordham Road, Bronx.

Mr. Lonergan, who is connected with the New York World, is a lecturer of great distinction and has given the tariff much consideration:

THE WORLD, BRONX OFFICE,
New York, June 15, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As one of your constituents, allow me to congratulate you on the position you have taken on the tariff on wool.

To reduce the tariff gradually from time to time will not create any business disturbance, and it is a much wiser course than to take a radical action. The bulk of the Democratic Party in New York is and always has been in favor of conservative business action.

Wishing you every possible success, I am,

Yours, sincerely, THOMAS S. LONERGAN.

This letter from one of the leading attorneys of New York City expresses concisely the views of college men of his type:

SHEPARD & PRENTISS,
New York, June 13, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to venture a word for the middle course in revising the wool schedule, which I see is favored by you and by other Representatives.

Eventually we shall have free wool. The enlightening disclosures by Mr. Underwood's committee of the outrageous profits gathered by the wool interests would doubtless justify our having it now. But the extravagant public expenditures to which the Nation has been committed, inaction in business affairs, as well as the necessity for new revenue adjustments, seem to indicate that a tempering of the wind to the shorn lamb would for the moment be the wiser course; and that policy would, I believe, meet the common approval of the thoughtful independent voters of New York State.

The present session appears to afford a most satisfactory surprise to the people of the country generally, and there is growing evidence that doubt and apprehension are giving room to the confidence which a consistent and constructive line of action inspires in trade and industry.

Very truly, yours,

EVARTS L. PRENTISS.

Let me read now a communication from the president of one of the largest corporations in the United States. This gentleman has expressed his opinion freely, but has asked that his name be withheld. I will say that the corporation over whose destinies he presides has assets of over $500,000,000. He was until last year a consistent Republican, and contributions from the officers and employees of his company have in past political contests enriched the campaign chests of the Republican Party by large amounts. Last fall he voted with us, and he says:

MY DEAR MR. AYRES: * * * I don't mind saying to you, however, that I think the Democratic Party has a great opportunity to get close to the conservative element of the country. The Democratic House did well in passing the treaty of reciprocity with Canada. It will do still better if it does what it can to create a permanent tariff commission, and, after laying down certain principles which are to guide the work of the commission, gives the commission power to revise the tariff. This would make it a matter of business, as it ought to be. Such action might not please those radicals who want the wool schedule and other schedules immediately ripped from end to end, without regard to the fact that vast interests are closely bound up with the existing tariff.

I believe the country generally wants a revision of the tariff, and wants it revised downward; but it doesn't want Congress to use dynamite in doing it. Definite, conclusive action, which shows not only that the Democrats in Congress are determined that the tariff shall be revised downward, but shows, in addition, a businesslike program which, while it may not revise the tariff in a minute, will ultimately surely revise it, is the thing.

* * * * * * *

Listen now to the views of a physician:

BRONX, NEW YORK CITY, June 15, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of the 12th instant concerning the bill for reducing duties on wool and woolens, I beg to say that I am heartily in favor of this bill. It seems to me much more expedient to reduce the duties at this time rather than to try to make a more sweeping reduction—free wool.

* * * * * * *

Your idea of consulting your constituents appeals to me. You can get a good idea of how the majority feel, and this may aid you in determining your action.

Respectfully, yours, E. WALLACE MACADAM, M. D.

Here are two letters from neighbors. They live on the same avenue in the Bronx, and, while their expressions are different, they have come to the same conclusion:

NEW YORK, June 13, 1911.

Mr. STEVEN B. AYRES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to call your attention to the wool tariff bill now before the House, and, as a member of your district (having moved into your district since last election), wish to suggest to you that you support a measure giving gradual tariff reduction on woolen goods, as, I believe, this is infinitely better for business in general than the free list supported by the radicals.

With very best wishes,

Yours, truly, OLIVER H. H. GEDEIST,
2065 Valentine Avenue.

NEW YORK, June 15, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I favor a gradual reduction of the tariff on wool; it is my opinion that a radical free-wool bill would go pretty hard against small manufacturers with a stock on hand.

Allow me to congratulate you on your thoughtful action in endeavoring to reach the minds and wishes of your constituents; I think that if this were done more—all over the United States—the condition of the country, and of politics itself, would be much benefited.

Respectfully, yours,

OTTO NAUSS,
2045 Valentine Avenue, Bronx.

The following letter is a free expression of the opinion held by some of those who were not born in our country, but have become citizens:

NEW YORK, June 12, 1911.

Mr. STEVEN B. AYRES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I heartily indorse the attitude of the Ways and Means Committee in reducing the exorbitant tariff on all necessaries of life, and trust the Democratic Party will carry out all its pledges.

Articles of luxury can stand a heavy tax, such as tobacco, for instance; but commodities essentially vital should be lessened of as much tariff as is consistent with the doctrines of the Democratic platform.

Very respectfully, JOSEPH LAPINI,
2052 Ryer Avenue, Bronx Borough.

Here is another letter from a workingman:

NEW YORK, June 12, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYERS.

SIR: Your communication has been received, and would reply that I am in favor of free wool, or the nearest we can get to it. A gradual reduction would be a step in the right way.

Respectfully, yours,

EDWARD P. MAHONY,
58 West One Hundred and Eighty-second Street.

And here is a letter which, in my opinion, expresses the Democratic doctrine on the subject of the tariff:

NEW YORK, June 14, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES.

DEAR SIR: * * * I am in favor of a gradual reduction of the tariff on all of those articles which are absolutely necessary in the homes of the poor and middle class of our citizens. I am not a free trader. Although a Democrat, I believe in a tariff for revenue only.

Respectfully, yours,

JAMES R. PUTNAM,
411 East One Hundred and Seventy-eighth Street, Bronx, N. Y.

There is not time now to read you many more of these letters, and I must conclude by quoting a part of two that have been received within the last few days from editors widely separated. The first is from William Jennings Bryan, editor of the Commoner. I do not give all of his letter, because it contains other and personal matters; but the first of it is as follows:

THE COMMONER,
Lincoln, Nebr., June 7, 1911.

Hon. STEVEN B. AYRES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. AYRES: You may quote me as saying that the bill indorsed by the caucus is very much better than the present law, and better than we could expect from any Republican Congress, but not as good as we ought to have had from a Democratic Congress. * * *

Very truly, yours,

W. J. BRYAN.

And, finally, may I read a part of a letter written by an old friend, who is editor in chief of one of the principal Republican newspapers in an interior city of the State of New York. I am not permitted to give his name, for obvious reasons. He says:

MY DEAR FRIEND: The new leader of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives, Mr. UNDERWOOD, seems to be creating a very favorable impression on the whole country.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMS. I do not see why he should want his name suppressed.

Mr. AYRES (reading):

He must have wonderful powers of leadership, for this is the first time that a Democratic leader in the House ever led anything more than a mob of discontents and kickers.

[Laughter.]

He seems to have an aggressive and harmonious army at his back, who stand by him through thick and thin; and I am afraid that the Republicans will have to hustle to give you that lovely trimming at the polls that you deserve for your abominable political principles and inherent cussedness.

[Laughter.]

Seriously, my friend, you folks are getting so good that we Republicans are beginning to "git skeered."

[Laughter and applause.]

If I may summarize the expressions of the hundreds of letters, I would say that 90 per cent of the writers are in favor of a gradual reduction of the woolen tariff. The writers of two or three letters are in favor of a prohibitive tariff on wool. One gentleman wrote that he wished the tariff abolished altogether and that the revenue necessary for this Government be raised by the collection of a tax on land. Several other letters were from those who believed in free raw wool, but the great majority expressed adherence, belief, and approbation of the Underwood bill. I believe I am justified in saying that it has a greater support among the people than any proposed wool legislation since the Walker tariff of 1842.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad that this bill meets the approval of the great commercial classes throughout our country. It gives an opportunity to say, what has not heretofore in this discussion been sufficiently emphasized, that this bill is a promise by the Democratic Party, whose representatives are here assembled in Congress, of the temperate and judicious legislation that may be expected by the country from the Democratic Party if our lease of power is continued in the House of Representatives and extended throughout other branches of the Government. Now, in what I am about to say I do not wish to be considered as speaking with authority, for no man can speak with authority for any great party, but I believe these things to be true and that they ought to be said in justice to the party and to the people. The Democratic Party is a conservative party. In all its history the majority of the members have not been in favor of sudden and radical changes. It has been authorized by the people to revise the tariff schedules. It proposes to revise them and to enact such other financial legislation as may be necessary; but to do this in a temperate and rational way which will cause no jar to the business world, but on the contrary will stimulate and upbuild the business interests of the country. When the cotton schedule is revised it will be revised upon the same principles which have been used in revising this woolen schedule.

And, Mr. Chairman, this does not involve a surrender of any of the principles of the Democratic Party. These remain the same. But perhaps it may be said that it does involve a new application of the principles of the Democratic Party. We believe in the lowest possible tariffs which will produce the revenue necessary for the operations of the Government, but we do not believe in going suddenly from one form of tariff taxation, no matter how bad it may be, into another, although a better system. Sudden changes are not good for commerce. We have taken heed of that pronouncement of Macauley, who said in one of his remarkable political essays, and I paraphrase his remark, that "the most sincere reformers should remember that even the worst abuses must not be wiped out too suddenly, lest the result be worse than the abuse itself." Therefore, in all the remedies that shall be applied to the evils that have grown up under the Republican régime of high protection, we shall endeavor to move slowly, and thus remove the evils gradually, in order that we may come upon an honest and satisfactory business basis by slow but sure degrees. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is the greatest commercial nation the world has ever known. Beginning 120 years ago with a fringe of settlements along the Atlantic coast, with no manufacture, little commerce, prostrate from the effects of a war both civil and foreign, we have developed so greatly that now our business affairs surpass those of any other nation. We have grown so greatly by the development of our natural resources and the vigorous spirit of our American institutions that the annual production of our mines, farms, and manufactories exceeds in each year the value of any capital city of the European world. It is sometimes said by those whom we have surpassed that this is a too purely commercial Nation; that our thoughts are given over to, and our energies circumscribed by, the opportunities of trade. I do not look upon this as a condemnation. It seems to me to be alike a reality and an opportunity. Every civilization which has in its flowering produced masterpieces of use or art has had as its basis a flourishing condition of trade and commerce. It is said by the critical that we have much to learn as yet from older civilizations as to the niceties of life and the easier ways of living. It may be so. We are yet in a formative stage. I do not quarrel with those who hold these beliefs; but the time will surely come, if it is not already upon us, when the fruits of our industry will give us in every line of endeavor the best and highest that the critical may desire. And it has seemed to me most fitting that the soon-to-be-erected building of Commerce and Labor, which in two or three years will stand facing the Monument on our Mall, should look out upon what is already the most beautiful city in the world. [Applause.]

Now, of what does our commercial population to-day consist? It consists roughly of three divisions. On the one hand a series of stupendous trusts, some plainly evil, some possibly benevolent; at the opposite extreme a slowly growing collection of radical forces brought into life by the exactions of the trusts and added to by constant accretions from foreign lands, many of whose citizens come here tinctured with socialistic illusions; and between these two elements lies the third division of our population—the individual traders, the men who are engaged in business for themselves and on their own resources. To this class belongs the banker and the man who runs the ice-cream saloon. To it belongs the manufacturer whose products cover the country, and the working man who by virtue of his superior skill has come to have a vested interest in the industry at which he works; the lawyer, the preacher, the doctor, the farmer, every laborer who has a few dollars in the savings bank or a place that he holds by virtue of his ability. In fact, all the great body of our citizens who believe the rights of the individual should be maintained and that he shall enjoy, as he desires, the fruits of his industry. This is still the most numerous class and it is the class which has controlled and will control the destinies of this country. No man has ever been elected President of the United States who has not had the support of the majority of this great body of conservative citizens, and no party has been placed in continued control of our Government which has not relied for its support upon the suffrage of these citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I confess I am a partisan. I believe most fully in the doctrines of the Democratic Party. I believe in the rights of the individual and in the extension and safeguarding of those rights, and that the success of our party will in every way be an advantage to the industries and people of this country. For what intelligent citizen of this Republic can view the continuance of the Republican Party in power as it is at present constituted with any degree of satisfaction? In this House and in the country it is divided into two factions, between which there is apparently an unpassable barrier. On the one side still remains the majority of the old Republican Party—standpatters—worshiping in adoration before their outworn protection idols, rising in protest at the slightest suggestion of lower tariffs or freer business methods. And on the other side the radical contingent, which is commonly called insurgent. The expressed desires of some of these gentlemen are much more radical than anything the Democratic Party has ever wished. They give their adherence to every new notion that is proposed by the visionary and the doctrinaire. To-day the country watches them squabbling in both houses of Congress. In the one not able even to elect a presiding officer, and in the other not able to secure a major portion of their votes for a sensible piece of legislation like the reciprocity bill, urged upon them by a Republican President. How could they join in a sensible working whole? Mr. Chairman, it is impossible. There is in the Republican Party an irrepressible conflict which must be once and finally decided before that party can be of any further use to the country. It must either become all standpat or all insurgent. One idea or the other must give way. The party must represent something definite before the American people will again trust it.

In accordance with a provision of the Constitution, we have passed in this House a reapportionment bill which readjusts the electoral votes of the different States in accordance with the changes of the population. This bill has gone from us to that august body which sits at the other end of the Capitol. It will there in due time doubtless be enacted into law. There has been some discussion in this House of late as to whether the two legislative bodies of the Government are still deliberative; but I can say, without hope of successful contradiction, that if one of them is not a deliberative body it is certainly a deliberate one.

This reapportionment bill gives to the great State of New York at the next presidential election 45 votes, and the political conditions are such that the party which wins the State of New York will surely win the control of the Government. New York is the most important commercial State in the Union. The conditions that have been described above obtain there as fully, or more fully, than in any other State. The Democratic Party carried the State of New York last fall by appealing to the conservative commercial classes, and the only way in which we can continue to hold that State is by meriting the further approbation of those classes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, it is never agreeable to take part in a perfunctory act, but I recognize that taking part in this debate at any time is more or less perfunctory, because it is not going to change the result of the action of the House. If I were going to talk about the details of the bill, or the merits of the bill, I should not use either the time of the committee or my own time for that purpose, though the latter is of little value just now. There have been some things said, however, about the bill which seem to me to require explanation and answer, both as to woolgrowing and the manufacturing of wool, and it is to those subjects I am going to devote myself during the time assigned to me.

I should, however, refer somewhat in detail to the work of the present Tariff Board, if that subject had not been admirably covered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] in the remarks which he has made to-day. I think anybody who examines the work of that board will be impressed with the probable results of its investigation. Suppose any Member of this House had been instrumental, in connection with his own business, in establishing an organization for the purpose of providing himself with information, and while that organization was in the process of preparing that information, doing it as well as it could be done, would he then be likely to go ahead and make his change without waiting for the conclusions of his investigations? Such a course would be ridiculous. That is exactly what we are doing here now; not with the hope that we are going to get any net results out of it, but for political purposes this House is going to pass a bill.

If it were going to do the businesslike thing, it would wait until next winter. This would not affect the position of the dominant party in the House, because the political complexion of this body is not going to change for nearly two years, and the House could then make use of the information which it would have at first hand, much of it new, and apply it to its legislation. I do not know, and I do not know anybody who does know, just exactly what effect this legislation will have on the allied wool industries. In common with many Members of this House, I had supposed, and still suppose, that this schedule may be somewhat revised and give better satisfaction; and I want to say here that I am a great deal more concerned about the possibility of doing serious injury to the woolgrowing industry than I am about doing serious injury to the manufacturing industry, because the manufacturing industry can better adjust itself to changes in a tariff, if it has time to do it—and that brings to mind one of the difficulties of this situation. Gentlemen on that side say this is a step in the right direction. Nobody knows what the next step is going to be or what the last step is going to be. One of the principal elements in making up business stability is to have a known foundation on which you may base your business, on which you may raise capital. Now, I submit to the committee that it is not going to be easy to raise capital for this industry, or any other industry, if you have to go to the people who are looked to to furnish that capital and say to them, "We can do business along these lines, as long as this proposition lasts; but we are told by those in authority that it is not going to continue, that it is going to change from time to time, and we will have to readjust our business to conform to those changes." That is one of the disturbing things—the most disturbing thing to me in connection with this whole subject. It has been charged by several gentlemen—many speakers have referred to it—that the wool business, the manufacturing end of it, is controlled by a trust or a monopoly; that it oppresses its employees; that it pays them insufficiently; that it has made extortionate profits from the conduct of its business; and that in many ways it is inimical to the public interest.

I agree that, if there is a trust in this business or a monopoly in connection with the business, it is an element which should be considered by this House, a very important element, too, in revising the tariff, but I believe that many of the statements which have been made here about this industry are not justified, and it is largely for the purpose of pointing out some of the things which have been said about it and some reasons why I think they are not justified that I am taking this time. I am going to try to demonstrate briefly that there is no monopoly or trust connected with the wool-manufacturing business, either the American Woolen Co. or any other wool-manufacturing company; that the American Woolen Co. is not controlled by millionaires or speculators, who exploit its stock at the expense of the public or the company; that it has not made extortionate or even large profits; that it has not oppressed its employees of any age or sex, and does not control the price of labor in this industry; that it does not and has not controlled the price of wool; that it is not entirely a worsted industry.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I am always willing to yield for interruptions, if I have time to do it.

Mr. HARDY. I just wish to say that if the gentleman expects to treat this subject later in his discussion I do not want him to answer it now, but right there he made the statement that they had not controlled the price of wool. What occurs to me as of interest in this discussion, if I understand the facts aright, is that the foreign price of wool is and has been very little above during all these years the domestic price of the same quality of wool, notwithstanding the tariff on wool of 11 cents per pound.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the condition to-day, but it is not the condition all the time.

Mr. HARDY. I noticed in a home paper which just reached here to-day the fact that at El Paso about 3,000,000 pounds of wool had recently been sold. The paper gave all the details as to the sale of it, except that it did not give the price. It looks strange to me that the price paid was not given. I would like to ask the gentleman, in the course of his remarks, to explain, if he can, why it is that, notwithstanding 11 cents a pound duty—that is, on wool—our home wool has not risen and remained above the price of foreign wool perceptibly?

Mr. WEEKS. I intend to refer to that later, but I may overlook it, so I will answer the gentleman now. To-day there is not a great difference between the prices of domestic and foreign wool, but that is largely due to the present agitation of the tariff; the price of wool is low because the manufacturing end of the industry is not actively employed; manufacturers are probably not working over two-thirds time, and in many places less than two-thirds time.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would like the gentleman to explain, if he can explain it. He says it is due to the present agitation. Why, it has been substantially so during all these years.

Mr. WEEKS. That is not true.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean to give the impression that the decrease in the price of wool has been so recent as to be attributable solely to the agitation in regard to this schedule?

Mr. WEEKS. The gentleman saves himself by using the word "solely."

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, largely.

Mr. WEEKS. The price of wool has been declining for the last year. It has been declining especially since the Democratic majority was elected to this House, and as soon as it was announced that the tariff was to be revised.

Mr. SHERLEY. The decline was before that, was it not?

Mr. WEEKS. It had declined somewhat before, but there was a well-defined idea abroad months before the election last year that the gentleman's party would control the House. I will give the gentleman figures later on.

Mr. SHERLEY. The reason I interrupted the gentleman is I happened to have a conversation some months ago with a wool manufacturer in my own city, in which he stated the price of wool was declining, and would continue to decline, on account of particular conditions, and he elaborated them at great length.

Mr. WEEKS. Wool has declined in price on account of trade conditions, because trade conditions are bad; the demand for it is slack.

Mr. SHERLEY. But, aside from that, I have respect for the gentleman's intellectual integrity, and I want to see if I am right in supposing he was willing to let the statement go to the country that political agitation was the cause of the decline in wool.

Mr. WEEKS. To a considerable extent, but not entirely.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman not explain this matter, also, as to why there is such a close approximation of price, not just recently, but all along, at different times during the last 10 years?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not understand that that is a correct statement.

Mr. HARDY. I do not mean it has always been so, but from time to time it has approximately and pretty generally, or frequently, been so.

Mr. WEEKS. It depends upon the condition of trade, and there are other elements than the tariff which enter into the condition of the trade.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield.

Mr. CLINE. I desire to inquire if it is not a fact that the price of Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio wool declined 11 cents in price from 1909 to 1910?

Mr. WEEKS. I have the exact figures of the price of wool for each week for the last two years.

Mr. CLINE. For the two seasons to which I referred?

Mr. WEEKS. It is breaking into what I should say later on, but I will answer the question now and give the exact figures. What are the dates?

Mr. CLINE. Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky wool, the general price from 1909 to 1910 declined 11 cents. That was before any election occurred.

Mr. WEEKS. Ohio washed wool was selling—the first date I have here is August 9, 1909—this is XX, at 35 cents a pound, and one year later I find, August 5, 1910, it was selling at 30 cents a pound, a decline of but 5 cents in that time.

Mr. CLINE. That was before the election?

Mr. WEEKS. That was before the election. Not 11 cents, as the gentleman states, but 5 cents a pound in that year, and those figures I have given are about the highest and lowest prices during that time.

Mr. CLINE. Are the Kentucky and Indiana classifications there?

Mr. WEEKS. The Kentucky and Indiana classifications are here. Thirty-three cents was the price of Kentucky and Indiana wool August 6, 1909. One year later the price had declined to 27 cents, a decline of 6 cents a pound.

Mr. CLINE. I do not want to interrupt, but I would like to ask another question, namely, if it is not a fact that the price of all grades of wool have appreciated in the open market since this bill has been reported to the House?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not remember when the bill was reported. The last figures I have are in April.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask if the fact that this bill was reported with a duty on wool, whereas it was prophesied we would have free wool, would have that effect?

Mr. WEEKS. It was prophesied we might have free wool, and of course there was a great pressure to sell it. Buyers of wool held off, and would hold off, of course, until the tariff on which they must base their future business was settled.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will pardon me, was it not published widely that a majority of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee were in favor of free wool, giving the names and the number?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly. And I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] that a list has just been handed me giving the prices of wool since this bill was reported, and there seems to have been an increase from half a cent to a cent a pound.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield? Assuming his premise of conditions in the political world affecting the price, did not the statement of the President as to the indefensible character of the woolen schedule, and its need of revision, have something to do with the price of wool?

Mr. WEEKS. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I am not the keeper of the President's opinion on public questions.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think he needs a keeper for that remark; but does the gentleman think so?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know what influenced the President, and I do not know what influences any other gentleman in making a debatable statement on such a subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. I asked the gentleman whether the President's remark had influenced the trade. He was talking about the sensitiveness of the trade to Democratic effort. I wanted to know if the President's statement as to the indefensible character of the woolen schedule had something to do with the trade?

Mr. WEEKS. I have no way of estimating it, if there were such an effect, but I do not recall that it affected prices.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not think the gentleman would, either of that or the other matter of the effect of Democratic influence on the trade.

Mr. SHARP. I would like to ask, if it was put upon partisan ground, would not the fact that the Senate was overwhelmingly Republican and the President was a Republican be a sufficient safeguard?

Mr. WEEKS. That would be true, if it was not reported there were Republicans enough in the Senate who would be likely to vote for this bill, so that it would pass.

Mr. HARDY. Was it reported that the President also might sign it?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not seen any report to that effect.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not think that crystallized public opinion against high prices had something to do with cutting down the price of everything as well as wool and the finished products of wool?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, there has been a great falling off in the volume of business, which always means a lowering of prices. That may have had something to do with it. All of these elements enter into such a result.

The other day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS], during an interesting address which he made on this subject, made some statements which I want to call briefly to the attention of the committee. The first one refers to the American Woolen Co. I read his remarks from the RECORD:

> This gigantic corporation controls more than 31 per cent of the woolen goods manufactured in this country and practically all of the worsted goods made here, representing, as I have said, an ostensible capital of $69,000,000, organized in the year 1899, by combining the following mills.

Then he gives a correct list of the mills. He goes on to say:

> These several factories comprising the American Woolen Co. that I have described then surrender their charters and all combine under one trust charter and issue new stock for five or six times the value of their several plants.
> They can put upon the market one-half of these stocks to the unsuspecting public and receive therefor in cash two and one-half times what their 34 plants are really worth, and yet retain the other half of the stock, and with it control the directorate and management of the corporation.

Now, if those statements are true, it is a serious condition of affairs; and it is to these statements that I wish to call your attention. Incidentally, however, before doing so, I want to say that the gentleman from Ohio early in the session, I think on the 5th of May, introduced a resolution which stated, as directly as a resolution can state, various things of a damaging nature about the American Woolen Co., providing for an investigation by Congress. That resolution has been lying since that time in the custody of the Committee on Rules, to which it was referred. I am not aware that any action has been taken. In fact, I know nothing about the action of the committee on this subject. But it is certainly significant that a resolution of that character, referred to a committee which I think has not been disinclined to report out matters relative to investigations, should have been held up by it for six or seven weeks. Is it not possible that the committee has made some investigation and that they have not found that the American Woolen Co. is a trust or monopoly, as the resolution charges?

Furthermore, when my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, was addressing the House the other day on this subject, he was interrogated from this side and asked if it were true, or if there was any evidence before the Ways and Means Committee, as to the American Woolen Co. being a trust or a monopoly, and he replied that he had no knowledge of it and that there was no evidence to that effect before the Ways and Means Committee.

I submit those two statements as possibly having some bearing on the subject as to whether the American Woolen Co. is a trust or a monopoly.

Mr. FRANCIS. Does the gentleman live in Boston?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not live in Boston; no.

Mr. FRANCIS. In Massachusetts?

Mr. WEEKS. I live in Massachusetts; yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. Does the gentleman know that the company is not a trust?

Mr. WEEKS. I am going to define what a trust is, according to the best definition that can be found, and then I am going to prove mathematically that it is not a trust or monopoly under any definition that has ever been given.

Mr. FRANCIS. I assume that the gentleman is going to deduce his opinion from facts. Does the gentleman know the fact that one-half of the stock, nearly, is watered stock, representing no value?

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from Ohio will wait, I will not cover up anything. I have no purpose in covering up anything, and I will answer with patience any question the gentleman wants to ask me, if I have the time.

Now, there are in this country about 1,200 wool manufacturing establishments. There are 34 included in the American Woolen Co.'s plants. The number operated by individuals, as individuals, in 1905 was 333. The number operated by firms was 311. The number operated by corporations was 567, making up the total number existing at that time.

And I want to add here that it can not be said that the American Woolen Co. or the woolen industry has ever sold its products abroad at a lower price than the price asked in this country, because the sales abroad have practically been negligible for years. In other words, the people of this country are getting the benefits of what I will term intense competition in this country in the woolen and worsted industry.

The amount of capital in the year 1909 invested in the woolen and worsted manufacturing industry was $419,000,000. The capital at that time of the American Woolen Co. consisted of $35,000,000 of preferred stock and $29,000,000 of common stock. When the company was organized there was issued $20,000,000 of preferred stock and $29,000,000 of common stock. Issuing preferred and common stocks was the customary method of organizing corporations of that kind 10 years ago.

It was estimated at that time that the plants, including machinery, real estate, and good will, had a value of $25,000,000.

It is always claimed, by combining efforts as in such a case as this combination, that economies in operation can be brought about which may insure some dividend return on the good will and other non-liquid assets of corporations. The American Woolen Co. in its organization did not differ from others in this respect. At the same time, or at the end of the first nine months' business, the bills receivable of the company, the stock on hand inventoried at cost, and the cash on hand exceeded the current liabilities of the company by more than $10,000,000. Therefore there were actual cash assets of more than 50 cents on a dollar for all the preferred stock issued, and, as I have stated, it was estimated that the plants were worth at that time $25,000,000. I do not know personally as to that, but I do know that there were many of the mills in excellent condition, that they were well equipped, that they were doing a good business, and some of them a profitable business; and, in any case it would be insane to say that the plants were not worth, as going corporations, at least $10,000,000, which, with the excess of quick assets, was the amount of the preferred stock outstanding.

Now, I want to say right here, before I get away from it, that no dividend has ever been paid on the common stock, and quite likely no dividend ever will be paid on the common stock; that it has not had a wide public market, that it has sold at from $10 to $40 a share; and, therefore, there having been no dividends paid on it, it has not been a burden on the public or a burden on the business. The only burden on the business has been the dividends paid on the preferred stock.

Mr. FRANCIS. Why should there be a dividend paid on this common stock? Was it not given simply as a bonus? Had it any value whatever?

Mr. WEEKS. I think it was partially given as a bonus.

Mr. FRANCIS. Why should it pay any dividends?

Mr. WEEKS. It never has and should not on any part of it which did not represent actual value or on account of economies in operation resulting from the consolidation.

Mr. FRANCIS. Then they organized this just as they organized any other company, full of watered stock?

Mr. WEEKS. That is debatable as to the water. But they have never paid any dividend on the stock, so it has been a burden on no one.

Mr. CLINE. I want to ask if it is a fact that $10,000,000 of that common stock has been retired and preferred stock issued for it?

Mr. WEEKS. Common stock to the value of $9,000,000 has been retired by purchase and no preferred stock issued for it.

Mr. CLINE. Was not the stock retired at its face value?

Mr. WEEKS. It was not. I am told that $3,000,000, or about $30 a share, was paid for it.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the gentleman to say that the common stock had sold at $25 to $30 a share?

Mr. WEEKS. At varying prices, from $10 to $40.

Mr. CULLOP. It was sold to the public.

Mr. WEEKS. I am talking about the public market for the stock.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, if it never paid, and never will pay, a dividend, the public has just been buncoed out of that sum, has it not, and it has gone into the pockets of the incorporators?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think so, because the company has unanimously voted recently to buy $10,000,000 of this stock and pay $30 a share. At least that is the published report.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but they are paying for it out of the money that they buncoed out of the innocent public, and they have had the use of it all that time.

Mr. WEEKS. They never received any money in dividends on that stock. No dividends have ever been paid on it.

Mr. CULLOP. But they did receive the purchase price of it from the innocent public.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know. I have not seen the stock list of the common stockholders.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood you to say it was sold out on the open market.

Mr. WEEKS. I gave you its market price.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, it was purely a bunco game?

Mr. WEEKS. No; not at all.

Mr. CULLOP. If they took that money from the public and sold them worthless stock, what else could it be?

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman will permit me to answer, I will say that when the company was organized it was found that the value of the quick assets and of the real estate was materially more than the amount of the preferred stock which was issued, which was $20,000,000; that the common stock had a material value in real estate and equipment; and, in addition to that, it had the value which comes from a plant as a going concern, the good will of the business, such as always attaches to any manufacturing business.

Mr. CULLOP. Imaginary valuations and expansions such as occur in that kind of organization, and have occurred in all of them that have been organized on that plan, so that the watered stock is sold to the public, the innocent lambs are sheared, and then after a while the common stock is retired without any returns whatever.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana has inserted something which is in general accord with his usual ideas of describing business transactions, but there is no innocent public that has been abused in this matter. Everybody has known what the value of that stock was. All transactions in it, as well as reports of the company, have been at the disposal of the public.

The company has never advertised any common stock for sale since its organization, and has not sold any. It has never exploited it in any way since the original issue was made.

Mr. CULLOP. Has it not been put on the market through the stock exchange?

Mr. WEEKS. It is listed on the stock exchange.

Mr. CULLOP. Is not that the general way in which these combinations abuse the corporate law, and, as has been done for the last 10 years, the same as many others, they put out watered stock and sell it to the public, and take the money and either put it in their pockets or in the corporate treasury?

Mr. WEEKS. The general practice is to have some kind of assets to cover every dollar of stock outstanding; they may be quick assets, they may be real estate, or they may be the good will of the business, and so forth.

Mr. CULLOP. The difference, it seems, between my idea of conducting the corporation and the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts is that they shall not sell the watered stock to the public and take their money for it; in fact, giving them nothing for it; but it seems that the idea of the gentleman is otherwise. Now, if you mean, as above stated, that is my general idea of such things, I want to say that you are absolutely correct. I do not think a corporation has any more right to rob the public than has an individual. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think it and all who so manage it ought to be amenable to the criminal law for such conduct.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the applause that always comes from that kind of a remark. There has been no robbery of the public. The gentleman puts in my mouth words and ideas which emanate from his own mind. There has been no imposition on the public in this case. Public statements have been issued which anybody could get at any time they wanted them, whether they wished to become stockholders or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understood the gentleman right, he said that the common stock never paid a dividend and had not been a burden on the public because there had been paid by the company no dividend on the common stock. Now, the gentleman states that it has recently bought some common stock and covered it into the treasury of the company. Is that true?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think the purchase of that stock constitutes a burden?

Mr. WEEKS. That stock was bought—I do not know personally about that particular transaction—but that stock was bought after a properly called meeting of the stockholders, and the preferred stockholders voted unanimously to proceed with the purchase.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not questioning that. Either the stock has a value or it has not. If it did not have a value, the company is wasting a certain amount of its money. If it did have a value, the gentleman's statement that it did not have a value and the conclusions drawn from it are erroneous.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not say that it did not have a value. I said it was not a burden because it never paid a dividend. I said the estimated value of the real estate and machinery of the company was $25,000,000 when the company was organized, and the quick assets were $10,000,000, and only $20,000,000 of the preferred stock was issued against it, leaving a surplus of $15,000,000 in some kind of assets.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman stated that the common stock had been purchased out of the assets belonging to the corporation.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, this stock was purchased with assets representing a part of the earnings of the company, and to that extent, using the word "burden" as he used it, the common stock has been a burden.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman wants to go that far, we will assume from now on that it will be a burden, but up to this time it never has been.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not going that far. The gentleman has stated certain premises and then he cuts away from them.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have not cut away from them myself. I have simply stated the exact facts connected with the transaction.

Mr. SHERLEY. I grant the gentleman there is nothing unusual in the method employed, but I make the statement that the stock having a value—a value shown by the purchase of the company of its own stock—which, by the way, is sometimes a questionable proposition, is a sufficient answer to the statement that that stock is not a burden.

Mr. WEEKS. I have said that up to this time this stock is not a burden, and it has not been, because no dividend has been paid upon it.

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether the preferred stock of the company has a right to vote?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, yes; it does vote.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it has just twenty millions of preferred stock?

Mr. WEEKS. It had $20,000,000 when the stock was originally issued.

Mr. FRANCIS. How much has it now?

Mr. WEEKS. Forty millions. Now, if the gentleman will yield, I will describe how that additional stock has been issued. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] referred to that matter the other day, intimating that that stock had been issued without any suitable return to the company, or had been issued against assets of the company, obtained from earnings—neither of which statements is correct.

In 1905 $5,000,000 of preferred stock was issued at par, the company receiving $5,000,000 for it, possibly less an underwriting commission. In 1907 $10,000,000 of stock was issued and paid for at par, the company receiving $10,000,000. In 1909 $5,000,000 additional stock was issued and paid for by the public at par, and the company received $5,000,000, so that $20,000,000 additional preferred stock has been issued since the company was originally organized, and the company has received substantially $20,000,000 in cash for it. The gentleman from Ohio, and certainly the gentleman from Kansas, gave the impression that there had been no proper return to the company for the issuing of that stock.

Now, to go on and point out other reasons why I do not think the American Woolen Co. is in any way a trust. The only definition of a trust that I have ever heard which seems definite in terms comes from that distinguished Democratic leader who lives in Lincoln, Nebr., who at one time is reported to have said that a trust is an organization which does 50 per cent of the total business in any industry. A monopoly must necessarily be a company or corporation which controls prices, output, wages, and other elements entering into a business. I want to show that the American Woolen Co. does not come within either of these definitions. In the first place, the total capital——

Mr. FRANCIS. Why does not the gentleman take the last edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary and get the definition of a trust there, and then base his remarks upon that?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not that definition in mind now.

Mr. FRANCIS. That is authority.

Mr. WEEKS. For this purpose I am willing to take the definition of the gentleman to whom I have referred. The total capital in 1909 employed by all of the woolen and worsted manufactories in this country was $419,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the gentleman a division? Can he divide the worsted and other industries?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I can divide them. At that time the preferred stock of the American Woolen Co., which is the capital on which dividends have been paid, was $35,000,000, or about 8½ per cent of the total amount of the capital employed in both industries in the United States. The annual output of the American Woolen Co. has averaged from $21,000,000 the first year to $51,000,000 in the year 1909. Its average output has been about $40,000,000. The output of the worsted and woolen mills combined in this country varied from about $238,000,000 in 1899 to $308,000,000 in 1904 and $420,000,000 in 1909. In other words, the output of the American Woolen Co. has shown a gradual but varying increase, but has averaged to be about 11½ per cent of the total output of all of the woolen and worsted manufactories of the country, and the actual capital invested has averaged from 8.5 to 9.6 per cent of the total amount employed in these industries.

Mr. SHERLEY. In order that we may get the full benefit of the gentleman's figures, will he indicate, if he can, just the character of property embraced within those sums? It is quite possible that an industry might have a complete monopoly of a certain branch without necessarily controlling a large percentage of the entire industry.

Mr. WEEKS. I will undertake to speak of that, I think perhaps to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Kentucky.

It is charged that the American Woolen Co. is a worsted monopoly. It is a fact that there has been contention between those branches of the trade, due largely to the kinds of wool used and the duties on it, and that the worsted business has grown somewhat faster than the woolen business in the last 10 years; but the wearing of woolens or worsteds is largely a matter of fashion rather than the character of the manufacturing or the price of wool or any element that goes into the business. Just now the fashion seems to be turning and the woolen industry is looking up. The American Woolen Co. is not entirely a worsted manufacturing industry. It is both a woolen and worsted manufacturing industry. Thirty-four per cent of its business is woolen and 66 per cent of its business is worsted. Of the 34 per cent, or, rather, included in the 34 per cent, it owns the Assabet Manufacturing Co., of Maynard, Mass., which is one of the largest woolen mills in the United States.

Of its mills, 11 are worsted, 14 are woolen, and the remainder are a combination of woolen and worsted mills. Substantially two-thirds of the business is worsted and one-third of the business is woolen. Now, as to the general business throughout the country: In 1905 the worsted output was $165,000,000 in value and the woolen output was $142,000,000 in value. That year the American Woolen Co.'s output was nearly $49,000,000; it was one of its best years, actually and proportionally. Yet that year it did only about 12½ per cent of the total wool manufactures.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can the gentleman now make a subdivision, both of woolens and worsteds, because just that one division is not sufficient to show whether or not there be a control of the output of a particular class?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not do so at this time. It is possible I may come across some figures which will enable me to do that. It is pretty difficult to do that without much technical knowledge, which I do not pretend to have.

Now, another reason why it is not a trust: The number of looms employed in the woolen and worsted business in the United States in the year 1905 was 81,894, or, at least, that was the total number of looms employed in the wool manufacturing business. In woolens and worsteds the number was 69,541. The number employed by the American Woolen Co. at that time was 8,600, or about 12½ per cent. The number employed in New England at that time was 45,012, so that the American Woolen Co. did not at that time have over 20 per cent of the looms employed in the New England States alone in the woolen and worsted industry. The State of Pennsylvania, for instance, does 50 per cent more woolen and worsted business than the whole American Woolen Co. does in all the mills in all the States where they are operated.

ANOTHER COMPARISON.

Take the number of spindles. The number of spindles in operation in the year 1905 was 4,122,727, and the American Woolen Co. had 590,746, or 14.4 per cent of them.

In other words, neither in the number of employees, in the amount of equipment employed, in the value of the output, or in its capital stock has the American Woolen Co. at any time represented more than 15 per cent of this industry, and I submit to this committee, under such circumstances it can not be called a monopoly.

Mr. FRANCIS. Do you say it is 15 per cent of the whole business, or 15 per cent of the worsted business?

Mr. WEEKS. I said 15 per cent of the whole business.

Mr. FRANCIS. What per cent of the worsted business?

Mr. WEEKS. Taking the American Woolen Co.'s average business as $41,000,000, and taking an average of two-thirds as worsted, would give about $25,000,000. The total worsted business of the country in the year which I have used generally was $165,000,000, so the American Woolen Co.'s average would be a little more than one-seventh of the total worsted business of the country, or about 15 per cent. Now, the gentleman from Ohio, in his statement which I have quoted, said that it was nearly all of the worsted business and 31 per cent of the total business.

Mr. FRANCIS. Those are the figures that I got.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the gentleman was very much misled by the figures which were given to him, and that is my purpose, and my only purpose, in taking up the time of the committee—to try to give it accurate figures relating to this most important industry, employing tens of thousands of people and employing nearly $400,000,000 of capital.

Mr. FRANCIS. Let me inquire where you got the figures that you are now giving us?

Mr. WEEKS. I got the figures from the Bureau of Statistics, from the census reports, and from the annual reports of the American Woolen Co. Now, Mr. Chairman, I stated that, as a second proposition, which I have already referred to, that this stock was not controlled by millionaires or speculators, or otherwise, and I want to submit some figures to demonstrate that proposition. We often think, when we are talking about trusts, monopolies, and great corporations, that it means half a dozen men or a dozen men. We read in the newspapers that a dozen or 15 men control all the industries and all the real estate of some city, and things of that sort. The real truth of the matter is that the industrial wealth of this country has become greatly distributed, and is becoming more distributed every year.

Now, as to the owners of the shares of this American Woolen Co. Let me give you the figures. There are now 12,400 shareholders, holding an average of 56 shares each. The number of shares held by trustees and executors is 16,020. The number of women stockholders is 5,684, holding an average of 21 shares each. These are the plutocrats and the millionaires and the speculators who own the American Woolen Co. They are largely women and trustees, who own the control of that company, and the average shareholding of all classes of people is only 56 to each individual.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Is that the preferred stock or common stock, or is it both, that you are giving us now?

Mr. WEEKS. As far as the women stockholders are concerned it is preferred stock, and as far as the trustees are concerned also. I have not the notation here, and I have not the time to figure it out, so I can not tell about the other. In any case, let me explain to the gentleman, that if it does include the common stock the average preferred stockholding would be very much less.

Mr. CULLOP. What I want to know is whether it is the women and children and trustees that hold the common stock or preferred stock.

Mr. WEEKS. Trustees, as the gentleman very well knows, do not invest in non-dividend-paying stocks. They can not, under the laws of most States, do so.

Mr. CULLOP. They have fallen to their trusts because of the death of the owners.

Mr. WEEKS. Then the courts would compel them to dispose of the holdings as soon as possible, and in New England lawyers do not advise women to buy speculative stocks.

Mr. CULLOP. Lots of times women do not consult lawyers, but are induced to invest by flaming circulars which are sent abroad.

Mr. SHARP. I would like to inquire whether the controlling interest is not held, after all, by a few stockholders?

Mr. WEEKS. One-third of it is held by women and trustees.

Mr. SHARP. One-third of the interest in that company. In many other large companies that have many stockholders the stock is actually held by a comparatively few individuals.

Mr. WEEKS. I have known cases where that was true. I do not carry stockholders' lists in my mind. I have looked up some companies, and I did not find one where the control of the stock is held by 20 men. I think there are but very few companies where the control of the stock is held by that number. There are occasionally large stockholders, to be sure.

Mr. FRANCIS. You have looked up this matter for this specific purpose?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. Can you tell how much stock William M. Wood, the president, has, or how much Addicks, or Ayer, or any of the officers of the company have?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not tell the gentleman, because I have not looked at the individual stock list.

Mr. FRANCIS. Why can you not tell it when the charge is made against them that they are controlling that company in their own interest?

Mr. WEEKS. I thought the figures which I submit would appeal to the judgment of any reasonable man, one-half of the stockholders being women, that the control would not likely be in the hands of any one man or set of men.

Mr. FRANCIS. The gentleman knows that women are always credulous and buy easily.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know anything about the women that the gentleman from Ohio represents; but that is not true of New England women. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to ask what the gentleman is endeavoring to prove by showing us the facts and figures as to the stock held by women and children?

Mr. WEEKS. I was attempting to show that the stock was not held by speculators or manipulators or others who were exploiting the company against the interests of the public, against the interests of the stockholders, or the company itself.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The gentleman would not go so far as to say that because a majority of the stock was held by women and children it would excuse moral obliquities?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, no. I know that there are frequently moral obliquities in large affairs somewhere or at some time; but I want to say that when a company has been in operation for 12 years, and when in every one of those periods the number of stockholders has increased a considerable per cent, and where the company's affairs have been open to the public in regard to the issue of stock, the extent of its business, and so forth, and where the newspapers have freely commented upon the management of the company, it is not probable that the stockholders' list of that company is going to increase in number and the relative holdings of the stockholders decrease from year to year unless the management is not only not speculative, but reasonably sound and safe and conservative.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Is the gentleman aware that the majority of the stock of the Sugar Trust was held by women and children also?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I was aware of that fact.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. And would the gentleman argue from that that the management of the Sugar Trust was just and reasonable and fair?

Mr. WEEKS. I will say to the gentleman that in my opinion the management of the Sugar Trust in some respects was in the past simply deplorable, absolutely and outrageously so, but that is no reason for condemning other managements or other corporations.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. It does not follow, then, that because women and children hold the majority of the stock the management of this woolen company was in any way right?

Mr. WEEKS. No; but there is absolutely no evidence that the management of the American Woolen Co. has not been able and honest. The stockholders' list has greatly increased while the per capita holdings have decreased, and I want to repeat that what the gentleman has referred to about the American Sugar Refining Co. should and does receive the dissent of every honest and sane man. I have no excuses to offer for that sort of thing. I have nothing but condemnation for it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman says the majority of the stockholders are women and children?

Mr. WEEKS. I did not say a majority. I think it is about half.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman did not mean to say that the women held a majority of the stock?

Mr. WEEKS. No; not of the stock. I referred to the number of stockholders.

Mr. CULLOP. A majority of the stockholders do not always hold a majority of the stock?

Mr. WEEKS. Let me call this fact to the gentleman's attention: That in most of these cases the woman who has invested has an adviser—a safe and careful adviser—probably related to the profession to which the gentleman himself belongs. They have invested in that stock for many years, because it was considered that it was a safe stock, on which the investor could get a good return for the money invested. Does the gentleman believe that lawyers and financial advisers would recommend that such a stock should be bought if it were known to be speculative and not really a good investment?

Mr. CULLOP. I will say to the gentleman that I think they would be just as likely to make a bad speculation for themselves and for others as anybody else, and they might give unfortunate advice to their clients unintentionally.

Mr. WEEKS. We ourselves do not always make wise investments all the time.

Mr. CULLOP. I will ask the gentleman, as to the stock that has been sold, whether that is the stock that has been issued from time to time since the organization was formed?

Mr. WEEKS. Nobody can determine that. Nobody can tell what is original stock and what is stock held to-day. The stock changes hands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to go on and show that the American Woolen Co. has not made extortionate profits. It has paid in dividends $21,583,000, which is 7 per cent on the amount of preferred stock outstanding at the time the dividends were paid. The company has accumulated a surplus which has varied from $10,000,000, when the company was first organized, to $31,000,000 to-day, or an increase of $21,000,000. During that time the company has charged off on account of depreciation of plant and machinery $9,000,000, and has added to its plant, according to its own annual statements, cash paid out of its earnings to the extent of $6,881,000, or, in all, over $15,000,000.

There is, of course, a difference of opinion among manufacturers as to the amount of money which should be charged off on a plant. The probabilities are that 5 or 6 per cent on machinery and 3 per cent on real estate would be about a fair charge off; it is, at least, low enough. In England very often 10 per cent is charged off on machinery; but if we assume that the charge off is 4 per cent on the average amount of investment on machinery and real estate—which would be somewhat less than I am informed, by the best experts whom I have asked on this subject, ought to be charged off—and the average real value of the companies has been $40,000,000, that would be $1,600,000 a year which should have been charged off since it was organized, or would be very near the actual amount which has been added to the property in expenditures out of earnings and charged off on account of depreciation.

Mr. SHARP. I have forgotten what the gentleman stated a while ago as to the date when this company was organized.

Mr. WEEKS. In 1899.

Mr. SHARP. About 12 years ago?

Mr. WEEKS. In April, 1899.

Mr. SHARP. And what was the original investment?

Mr. WEEKS. The original capitalization was $20,000,000 preferred stock and $29,000,000 common stock, and I have stated that it was estimated that the real estate, fixtures, and so forth, were worth $25,000,000, and that at the end of the first year, which is my only way of determining the figures, the entire quick assets exceeded the current liabilities by $10,700,000, in round numbers.

Mr. SHARP. They have now about $40,000,000 issued against that of preferred stock.

Mr. WEEKS. They have $40,000,000 of preferred stock.

Mr. SHARP. And the original investment was $25,000,000.

Mr. WEEKS. The original value of the plant was $25,000,000, taking the estimates made at the time.

Mr. SHARP. What was the amount of stock issued?

Mr. WEEKS. The amount issued, of common and preferred, was $49,000,000, or $20,000,000 preferred and $29,000,000 common.

Mr. SHARP. Do you know, as a matter of fact, how much they paid for these plants?

Mr. WEEKS. They paid for them very largely in stock. Some of the stock was issued to the public to get working capital, but the plants were paid for largely in stock.

Mr. SHARP. You have no means of knowing the value of those plants at that time?

Mr. WEEKS. Auditors were put on those plants, as is usual and customary in such matters, and the auditors made their estimates of the value of the plants, and the assembled estimates of the value of all these plants was, I understand, about $25,000,000. Its value depends on whether a plant is in operation or idle. The machinery in an idle plant may be of value, because it may be removed, but an idle plant itself is of very little value. It depends on whether it is being conducted in such a way as to produce a profitable business or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much stock was issued against the $25,000,000 of assets?

Mr. WEEKS. The amount of stock issued against the $10,500,000 of quick assets, and the $25,000,000 real estate and machinery was $20,000,000 preferred stock and $29,000,000 common stock, on which no dividends have ever been paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is about 30 per cent in excess of the actual investment.

Mr. WEEKS. If you assume that the preferred stock was worth par that would leave a value of $15,000,000 against $29,000,000 of common stock, which would have made the common stock worth about 50 cents on the dollar. It has never sold at 50 cents on the dollar, and has never paid a dividend.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Were these widows and orphans who have invested in this common stock among the persons you have spoken of?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know of any widow or orphan who has invested in the common stock. I do not think there are any women and children who have done so. It is not the practice in New England for women and children to invest in non-dividend-paying and speculative stocks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was any of that common stock issued as a bonus with the preferred.

Mr. WEEKS. The stock was all issued at the same time. I have not the circulars before me; but I assume—and I think I am correct in assuming—that a statement was made of the value of the quick assets of the company, of the real estate, of the good will, and of the other items that go to make up a manufatcuring business, and the aggregate issue was $49,000,000.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLINE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has now the figures showing the present surplus?

Mr. WEEKS. The surplus is about $31,000,000.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to know who holds this common stock.

Mr. WEEKS. I am sorry that I have not a stockholders' list. There are in all 12,500 stockholders.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. What is the amount of common stock outstanding?

Mr. WEEKS. Twenty million dollars.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. And the gentleman does not know who owns it?

Mr. WEEKS. No.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The gentleman says that no women or children own it.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know of any women or children that own any.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Then the male adults must own it, and they are more foolish than the women and children. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEEKS. I have no doubt that it is owned by male adults.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Then those male adults have taken chances on $20,000,000, and they are loaded down with $20,000,000 worth of stock that will never pay a dividend.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know whether it will or not, and I do not know that they are loaded down.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] had another comment to make about this company which I wish to read. He said:

> But this is not all. Here are men and women who have coined their lifeblood, muscle, bone, and sinew into a particular kind of work, and by their diligence and skill have made these mills a success. They are told that their wages hereafter will be a certain reduction; or they can turn out so much more piecework than formerly for their day's work. They remonstrate and threaten to quit their employment and to go to another plant. But there is no other works; they all belong to the same octopus.
> These laborers' lives and energies have been trained in this work; they can do nothing else. They have the alternative to be turned out on the commons or take just whatever this trust employer may choose to offer, and so they make dividends again.
> Truly, a commercial despotism has been and is sapping the life of the people. These trusts have become partners with our Government and have written the tariff schedules for the past 25 years in their own interest and in the interests of monopoly. Schedule K was written in the interest of the American Woolen Co.

I think I have pointed out that it is not an octopus.

If that statement is true, it is an extremely serious charge. I would like to point out to the committee wherein I do not think the facts justify that statement.

The increase in wages paid by all woolen manufacturers in 1907 over the average for a period from 1890 to 1899 was 31.9 per cent. At the same time the decrease in average hours had been 2 per cent. From the preliminary report issued last April by the Census Bureau relating to woolens and worsted goods I obtained these figures:

In 1899 the per capita wage paid employees in the United States engaged in this industry was $386. In 1904 it was $420 and in 1909 it was $471. In other words, since the organization of the American Woolen Co., and up to 1909, the increase in wages has been 22 per cent.

Now, the Census Bureau for 1905 gives the amount of wages paid in the United States in this industry at $79,000,000, paid to 185,592 employees, or $425 each. I think I am the last person, Mr. Chairman, in this House to make any comparison between sections of the country for the purpose of sectionalism, but I can not refrain, under these circumstances, when the American Woolen Co. is located in New England, except one factory, which is in New York, to make a comparison with other parts of the country, because these attacks are made against the American Woolen Co. Now, for the United States in 1905 the average wage——

Mr. FRANCIS. Is that rate of wages based on piecework or on daywork?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, very largely on week work.

Mr. FRANCIS. How largely?

Mr. WEEKS. In Massachusetts, entirely so, as far as I know.

Mr. FRANCIS. Has not that company put its employees on piecework?

Mr. WEEKS. As far as I know, in Massachusetts it is entirely on week work, and the pay roll has to be paid at the end of every week. I do not know of any case where piecework is employed, though I may be mistaken in this statement.

Mr. FRANCIS. Does the gentleman know that it is not?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I can not say definitely that there is no piecework done. For the United States, the average wage in 1905 was $425. For Massachusetts, the average wage in 1905 was $441. In that State are located nearly one-half of the American Woolen Co.'s plants. For the State of Ohio, the gentleman's own State, the average wage in woolen manufactures that year was $354, or, in other words, we were paying $87 per capita more in the State of Massachusetts—very largely by this American Woolen Manufacturing Co.—than was paid to employees in the woolen and worsted mills in the State of Ohio. I want now to go on and give some other figures. In 1905, in the Southern States—and I want to say that this is a small industry in the Southern States and in many of the Western States—the average wage was $292; in the Western States, $384; in the Middle States, $416. In the New England States, where all but one of the mills of the American Woolen Co. are located, it was $441, or some $150 more than in the Southern States, at least $50 more than in the Western States, and $25 per capita more than was paid in the Middle States of this country. I do not make these comparisons for any other purpose than to show that this industry, which is located in New England, has not been paying, comparatively at least, restricted or unfair wages to its employees.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. As far as the tariff laws may affect this industry, they affect it in all sections of the country alike.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. And therefore wages in the same employment are not uniform, although the tariff is uniform.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to explain to the gentleman that the wage scale paid is largely dependent, or to a considerable extent, on the size of the industry. You will find that in every community where there is a very large industry the wage scale is always higher than it is in a place where there is one mill or a small industry. That means there is more competition, and it means, furthermore, that a person brought up in definite employment is always in demand. They go sometimes from one mill to another, but anyone who has been well trained in any industrial employment always has a market for his or her labor; and that is frequently the reason why wages are higher in the larger centers.

Mr. SIMS. Does it not further show that those who employ labor always get it at the lowest price it can be had at the particular place where it is employed?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to specifically deny that. That is one of the elements that enters into all of these matters. The American Woolen Co.'s average wage for an average of 52 weeks in the year 1909 was at the rate of $539.76 per capita, or $10.38 per week. I want to call attention to the fact that this includes all classes of employees—men, women, and children.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Right on that point, can the gentleman inform the committee about what per cent of those employees are women and what per cent men?

Mr. WEEKS. I can and I will do that now. Those were the next figures I was coming to. In 1905, in the whole country, there were 94,841 men employed in the woolen and worsted industry, or 52 plus per cent of the whole. In the whole country there were 72,222 women, or 41 plus per cent of the whole. In the whole country there were 12,913 children—and that means under 16 years of age—or 7 plus per cent of the whole. I want to emphasize the fact that the American Woolen Co. is located largely in the New England States, and let me show what that demonstrates as to that point. The men employed in the New England States were 55,704, or 57 plus per cent of the whole, 5 per cent more than the country's average. The women employed were 36,929, or 37 plus per cent, or 4 per cent less than the average for the country. The children employed in the New England States were 5 per cent of the whole, or 2 per cent less than the average for the country; and I have figures here, which I will not take time to read, showing the number of men employed in the different States, as well as the number of women and children. I do, however, want to read this statement which applies to the State represented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS], because I think it is very pertinent, these charges having come from him.

In 1905 there were employed in worsted and woolen mills in Ohio 1,823 persons. Of these 558 were men, being 31 per cent of the whole; 994 were women, or 54.5 of the whole; 271 were children under 16 years of age, or 14.8 of the whole. In other words, the number of men——

Mr. FRANCIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. In a moment. In other words, the number of men employed in the Ohio factories were 21 per cent less than the average of the country; the number of women was 13 per cent more than the average for the country; and the number of children employed was 7.8 per cent more than the average for the country.

Mr. FRANCIS. I am not undertaking to defend that situation; but does not that account for the higher wage the gentleman speaks of in New England, that you employe more men, more skilled labor?

Mr. WEEKS. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that his own State in that respect makes the worst showing of any State in the Union which I have investigated.

Mr. FRANCIS. Is it not a fact our State is not a wool-manufacturing State at all——

Mr. WEEKS. It is not a large producer, but you manufacture 10 times as many wool goods as many of the States which make a much better showing.

Mr. SHERLEY. The New England mills successfully compete with these other mills where they have cheaper labor, do not they?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; because they have better selling methods, probably.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is that because you get a higher duty on the fine fabrics you put out, while we people of the South make the coarse fabrics on which there is a less duty?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think so.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am speaking of the same fabric.

Mr. WEEKS. I understand. Mr. Chairman, one other point I wish to touch on, and that is the question of wool itself. It has been stated here several times that the price of wool has been depressed by the American Woolen Co. or by combinations. The price of wool does vary with conditions of the trade, and for other reasons, as has been stated here this afternoon both by the questions and, I hope, by the answers which I have tried to give. But the fact is the price of wool in this country has gradually increased during the last 10 years. The increased number of pounds produced has been 7 per cent and the increased value has been something like 40 per cent in that time. The increase has been almost steady from year to year up to last year. I do not think that will probably be true this year; but the fact is, we are not increasing our wool output; we are about holding our own, as shown by the following table:

Total value of wool clip of United States, including both fleece and pulled wool, based on scoured value in Boston.

Years.	Wool, washed and unwashed.	Total value.
	Pounds.
1901	302,502,328	$51,164,709
1902	316,341,032	60,679,127
1903	287,450,000	58,775,373
1904	291,783,032	64,940,959
1905	295,488,438	80,415,514
1906	298,915,130	79,721,383
1907	298,294,750	78,263,165
1908	311,138,321	61,694,616
1909	328,110,749	88 829,746
1910	321,362,750	72,489,838

And the world is not increasing its output very much. I want to call the attention of the committee to this one fact, that the wool industry and the sheep-raising industry in this country is, in my judgment, at the parting of the ways. We have got to decide, as Representatives, whether it is wise for us to abandon this industry or whether we are going to maintain a sufficient duty to protect and preserve it. There are some two or three hundred million dollars invested in it, employing a great many thousand men; the manufacturing industry itself employs nearly 200,000 people; there are tens of thousands of stockholders, as I have indicated, with their money invested in this industry, and we want to have a care whether we are going to deliberately abandon the industry and let it go, or whether we are going to maintain it by protecting it; and, as I say, we are at the parting of the ways. My judgment is that the wool industry is going down if we do not impose a higher rate of duty than carried in this bill. Now, if it goes down, my judgment also is that the American manufacturer in the end will not get any lower prices for the wool which he must buy than he is getting to-day. The wool will be raised abroad—what can be. The total output of the world has not increased very much and probably will not, so the price of wool will gradually increase anyway for a term of years, but it will increase faster if we abandon the industry in this country, in which case I have no doubt the foreigner will do what he always does, increase his price, putting in his own pocket what he is now paying into our revenues.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I agree with the gentleman fully in his observations, and do not challenge them, and he voices my sentiment in regard to raw wool. I wish to ask this question, and that is, whether coincident with the decline in raw material, which in the last 10 years amounted to 40 per cent, from 31 or 32 cents to 22 or 23 cents, whether there has been a corresponding decline in the price of the manufactured goods by the manufacturer, who generally lives in the East?

Mr. WEEKS. I can not answer that definitely, but will go into the question of profits.

The American Woolen Co., after making the charges off which I have described, after adding the additional capital which has been taken in during the life of that company, has made, I believe, a net earning of between 8½ and 9 per cent on its preferred stock outstanding. I am not an expert bookkeeper, but I have spent a good deal of time in going over the figures of the company, and it is my judgment that the net earnings of that company have been equal to a 7 per cent dividend on preferred stock, which has been paid, and about 1½ to 2 per cent in addition to that. I think the American Woolen Co. has been more prosperous than most other woolen industries in this country—at least, more profitable than they have averaged. The woolen business is intensely competitive. The output of the American Woolen Co. has averaged over $40,000,000 in the past 10 years. This year it will be very much less than that, although they have added to their plant within the last 2 years the finest mill in the world. They are not now working more than two-thirds time. The industry is exceedingly slack; and when it is so, then the price of wool must be low.

Mr. SHARP. That does not quite answer my question. I wish to know whether the price of manufactured goods has declined along with the price of raw wool?

Mr. WEEKS. I think, relatively, but I have not the figures at hand.

Mr. SHERLEY. The increase in capital stock, or the money received for that capital stock, goes into buildings and improvements and capital of the company?

Mr. WEEKS. I pointed out as well as I could that the $20,000,000 additional capital was paid for at par, so that $20,000,000 went into the business of the company. Whether that particular money, or some part of it, went into a building, or additional working capital, which is necessary, as the business has increased, I do not know, but the net quick assets are greater now than they ever have been.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is very important whether the $20,000,000 went in the capital account or not.

Mr. WEEKS. I pointed out all the suitable charges off on account of real estate, losses, and other matters. But I am glad the gentleman has spoken of that, because it reminds me of another thing to which I should have referred. The American Woolen Co. sells its own output. The commission which the ordinary manufacturer—especially the small manufacturer—pays for selling his goods is 5 or 6 per cent, including the charge the commission merchant makes for guaranteeing the manufacturer against loss. It is probably 6 per cent. On the output of the American Woolen Co. that would be $2,400,000 a year. But they sell their own goods. The expense of selling the goods is included in their general statements. If the net profit on that business—and I think it ought, at least, to be 2 per cent—were segregated from the other profit, it would bring the net profit for 10 years of the American Woolen Co. as a manufacturing business down to about 7 per cent, the amount paid on its preferred stock.

Mr. SHERLEY. Practically there was $25,000,000 when the company started?

Mr. WEEKS. That was the value of real estate, fixtures, and so forth, and $10,000,000 quick assets.

Mr. SHERLEY. Since then there have been $20,000,000 put in by the sale of the preferred stock?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. That makes $55,000,000. According to the gentleman's statement there is $31,000,000 of surplus and there has been over $20,000,000 in dividends. When the gentleman charges surplus and dividends together he has an amount equal to the amount invested in the company.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman from Kentucky will have patience and will look at my figures, he will see that I have not made such a statement and that he is entirely mistaken in coming to that conclusion. I have assumed, by making suitable charges off, suitable additions to the plant, and I have shown the amount of money spent on the plant——

Mr. SHERLEY. That is not wasted money that goes on that plant.

Mr. WEEKS. And taking into consideration the dividends paid and the additional surplus the company has acquired, including the profits made from selling, that it has made 8½ per cent annually on an average on its preferred stock and paid 7. The dividends should not be considered in making up a statement at this time, because they represent interest on the capital.

Mr. SHERLEY. The figures will speak for themselves as to the gentleman's conclusion and mine.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SISSON). Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. How much money has this company borrowed during this time?

Mr. WEEKS. Whatever money the company has borrowed has been repaid, with the exception that at the end of the last current year the current liabilities of the company were something like $5,000,000 and the current assets of the company were something like $36,000,000, leaving a net balance of $31,000,000.

Mr. FRANCIS. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that they have just issued in the last year $3,500,000 of 4½ per cent equipment notes?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not any such information, and I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FRANCIS. I had this from Hibbs & Co., one of the authorities on that subject.

Mr. WEEKS. I have been over the statements of the company, and the only securities issued have been the preferred stock, and the last issue was in 1909.

Mr. FRANCIS. Anyhow, the gentleman has not got that information?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not the information, and I do not think that is correct. I took my figures from the Bureau of Statistics, the reports of the Census Bureau, and the annual statements of the company. I do not know anything about Mr. Hibbs's figures.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that the product of the American Woolen Co. is a cheap product; that the people of this country were being obliged to buy a cheap article from which their clothes were made.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. CLINE. I want to beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him, and to thank him for the time he has yielded to me. I wanted to ask him a question before he got away from the question he is discussing. It is very evident from the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts that this corporation inside of 10 years has trebled, if not quadrupled, its assets.

Mr. WEEKS. Its quick assets?

Mr. CLINE. Not its entire assets.

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all. Its quick assets, and when I say "its quick assets" I include the cash, inventories at cost, and bills receivable on one side of the ledger, and current liabilities, such as bills payable and current bills payable from month to month, on the other, and that it has increased the net amount of these two items by $20,000,000.

Mr. CLINE. Does not the gentleman think it is fairly deducible from the facts stated here that this corporation has an abnormally undue influence in the field of trade; that it paid an 8 per cent dividend——

Mr. WEEKS. A 7 per cent dividend——

Mr. CLINE. A 7 per cent dividend on this large amount of stock——

Mr. WEEKS. Preferred stock——

Mr. CLINE. And earned a surplus of $31,000,000?

Mr. WEEKS. It has not earned that surplus. I have already stated that $20,000,000 in cash had been paid in. I have repeatedly stated that.

Mr. CLINE. I am making this statement partially from the speech delivered by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. WEEKS. I regret very much that Mr. MURDOCK is not here to-day. I notified him that I was going to criticize his statement, but I do not like to criticize the statements of a colleague when he is away, and therefore I have refrained from doing so. But I am frank to say that I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has been imposed upon in the figures which he submitted to the House the other day. In most particulars they were very far from the facts.

Mr. CLINE. I will say that I value the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts very much on this question, and I wanted his candid opinion on the question as to whether the company did not have an undue advantage in the market.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think so. And I want to say to the gentleman that when money loaned on anything like real-estate security commands interest rates of 5 and 6 per cent the man who is putting his money into an industrial business which is paying only 7 per cent, with all the risks that go with that business, is taking large chances in the investment of his money.

Mr. CLINE. The company has been making good all this time.

Mr. WEEKS. The company has done well; and I will say to the gentleman that the company has done better than the average woolen and worsted business.

Mr. CLINE. Is not the stock of the company above par now?

Mr. WEEKS. No; it is selling at about 92. If all the stock that the company had outstanding to-day were sold at the market price, the net amount would be about $42,000,000.

Mr. CLINE. You are taking into consideration the common stock.

Mr. WEEKS. I am taking into consideration the market price of the common stock and the market price of the preferred stock, which, taken together, would aggregate about $42,000,000.

Mr. CLINE. But you say the parties who hold the common stock never parted with any consideration for it?

Mr. WEEKS. I did not say that. I am talking about the market value.

One more false impression which I wish to remove, though I apologize for taking so much time—that the quality of goods manufactured by worsted and woolen manufacturers in this country has not depreciated, but has been constantly increasing. I get this information from the preliminary statement made by the Bureau of the Census, and published on April 4, 1911. This statement shows that there have been some interesting and important changes in the character of materials used during the past decade. The quantity of wool consumed by worsted and woolen manufacturers, in condition purchased, increased from 330,179,000 pounds to 474,751,000 pounds, or 44 per cent. Reckoned on a scoured-wool basis, the increase was 50 per cent.

The quantity of raw cotton consumed decreased from 40,245,000 pounds to 20,055,000 pounds, or 50 per cent, while the amount of cotton yarn purchased increased from 35,343,000 pounds to 39,169,000 pounds, or 11 per cent. The net result is a decided decrease in the amount of cotton used as a material by woolen manufacturers.

The figures also show a marked decrease in the use of shoddy. The quantity purchased decreased 35 per cent, and the amount manufactured in woolen mills for use therein fell off 10 per cent. In 1899 the total amount of shoddy consumed by woolen and worsted manufacturers was 68,663,000 pounds. In 1909 it was only 53,621,000 pounds.

In other words, the amount of wool that has gone into the cloth worn by the people in this country in the past decade has increased 50 per cent at the expense of cotton and shoddy, which have been displaced by the wool.

Now, just one more point.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman see any argument in that last statement on shoddy for the present bill, which reduces the duty from a prohibitive duty to one of 20 per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly the amount of shoddy that is being used has been falling off; but if you reduce the duty I should think it would increase the importations of shoddy, and that we would get that much more shoddy in our clothing.

The amount of wool used per capita, including both domestic and foreign wool during the year 1910, in this country was 6.95 pounds, including the wool in imported fabrics.

Helmuth Schwartze & Co., of London, in their annual wool report, say that the per capita consumption of wool in Europe and America together in 1910 was 4.99 pounds. In other words, we used in this country 1.96 pounds per capita more wool than the rest of the world did. Of course, under those circumstances, we must have used materially more, because our figures are included in the world figures, as stated by these authorities.

Just one word more. I have taken the time to prepare these figures, because it seemed to me that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and other men who have spoken on this subject have had figures submitted to them which have not correctly stated the facts, which have imposed on them, and which, through them, have imposed on the knowledge which this House should have.

I do not know exactly what ought to be done about this woolen and worsted and wool schedule. I hope I will have some information on which I can base an opinion some time, but I want information, and before any change is made, I want to know why it is made. Of all fools, the biggest fools in the world are those people who fool themselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Before taking action in such an important matter as this let us obtain all the available information. It may not even then be complete, but we can certainly take the time to investigate it, cast out that which is false, and base our acts on what remains. The Congress of the United States, responsible as it is for the most far-reaching and important legislation, can not afford to proceed in any other way.

Mr. FRANCIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRANCIS. Under the facts which the gentleman has given us, does he claim that the American Woolen Co. should not be investigated?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not make any claim whatever about that. I have nothing to do with it. The Committee on Rules has that matter in hand, and it would be unbecoming in me to criticize the committee at this time.

Mr. FRANCIS. There should be no objection to it if it is eminently fair, as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. WEEKS. Personally I do not care whether it is investigated or not. If it is doing anything that is not right, I hope it will be investigated; but before an investigation is undertaken a sufficient reason should be given for so doing. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, as a preliminary to what I shall say on the pending bill at this time, I desire to relate briefly some of the important things which this Democratic House has done up to the present time in behalf of the American people. The Sixty-second Congress was convened in extraordinary session, by call of the President, on the 4th day of last April, just a little more than two months ago, and I might add, we, a Democratic House, were called together by a Republican President for the purpose of doing that which a Republican Congress had failed to do. The first thing we did was to cut down the running expenses of this House some $180,000 annually, demonstrating that we were sincere when we said we believed in an economical administration of the Government's affairs. Then we passed the bill known as the Canadian reciprocity bill. The Democrats of this House supported that bill, not because it is as good an agreement as the Democrats desired, not because it is a perfect agreement, but because of the fact that the Democratic Party believes in a reduction of the duties in the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and this agreement reduces the tariff tax on every item it touches in that law, so far as importations from Canada are concerned. The Democrats also voted for this agreement because we believed, as was often expressed by distinguished Republicans upon that side of the aisle, that the passage of that bill would serve as the entering wedge for the destruction of the protective-tariff system in this country. We believe, and have been preaching for a great many years, that when the Republican Party wrote into the tariff laws such provisions as a duty of 15 cents per bushel on corn, 15 cents per bushel on oats, 25 cents per bushel on wheat, and other like duties on farm products, and telling the farmers that it was for the purpose of protecting them against foreign competition, that you were deliberately misleading the farmers of the country, for the reason that our country is not an importing country with regard to those products, but, on the contrary, we are an exporting country in such products and our surplus in these commodities is fixed by the foreign price. Hence, we say that you have been fooling the farmers on this proposition and they will find it out when this reciprocity agreement with Canada goes into effect. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to see absolute free trade with Canada, and I think we shall see this brought about within the next two years, when the Democratic Party comes into full control of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic Party in its last national platform declared for publicity before the election of campaign contributions. We believe that the people are entitled to know before they cast their votes what persons and what interests are financing the campaigns of candidates for the Presidency and for Congress. If the directors in the Steel Trust, the Oil Trust, the Woolen Manufacturers Trust, or the great railway and other transportation magnates contribute to the campaign fund of a candidate, we believe the people ought to be advised of the fact before they cast their votes, and let them judge for themselves as to whether the candidates who receive such contributions will be true to the people, or whether they will carry out the will of the interests which put up the campaign funds for their election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Hence this House, in obedience to the pledge made to the people, passed a bill providing for publicity before the election of campaign contributions. Our party in convention at Denver in 1908 declared that United States Senators should be elected by the direct vote of the people, while the Republican convention at Chicago voted down this proposition. The Democratic Party believes, as it said in that platform, that this reform is the gateway to other reforms. The Democratic Party believes that the United States Senate and the Senators will be more willing and more ready to carry out the will of the people when they are elected directly by the people than when they are elected by the State legislatures. Hence this Democratic House passed a resolution submitting an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. The Democratic Party believes in bringing the Government just as close as possible to the people, and the Republican Party believes in taking the Government just as far away from the people as is possible. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic Party believes in and trusts the people, while the Republican Party believes in the special interests and distrusts the people. However, there is one ray of hope for the Republican Party, and that is, that the time has partially come when a cross between a standpat Republican and the special interests often, but not always, produces an insurgent Republican. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have also carried out another platform pledge of our party, by passing a resolution admitting the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona to the sisterhood of States.

Then, we have passed the bill known as the farmers' free-list bill, which, while the Government loses about $8,000,000 in annual revenue, yet the farmers will be saved about $200,000,000 in tariff taxes, which under the Payne-Aldrich tariff law goes into the pockets of the manufacturers of the articles we have placed on the free list in the farmers' free-list bill.

The following are a few of the articles used by the farmers which are placed on the list free of duty: Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements; cotton bagging and cotton ties; boots, shoes, harness, saddles, and saddlery; all kinds of fence wire, lumber, shingles, and fence posts, sewing machines and all parts thereof, and salt, that prime necessity which all of the people are obliged to use.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party has taken another step in behalf of the masses of the people in the presentation of this bill which is now before the House. The wool schedule is the one schedule which the President admitted that the Republican Party could not revise downward, owing to the great influence the woolgrowers and the wool manufacturers had with the Republican Party in 1909, when the Payne-Aldrich bill was written. The Payne-Aldrich law carries an average rate on wool and woolens of more than 90 per cent, while the present bill, framed by the Democrats of this House, has reduced the duty to an average of 42½ per cent. While personally I would have preferred to have seen written in this bill wool free of duty, yet it is a good bill and one which every Democrat ought to support, and, in fact, every Republican who desires better and cheaper woolen clothing for the 90,000,000 Americans should also support it. As I said, I am in favor of free wool, for the reason that, in my judgment, it has been the policy of the Democratic Party for a great many years, and for the further and more convincing reason that it is right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, let us examine the record and ascertain, if we can, what the policy of the Democratic Party has been on the wool question. In his majority report on the Democratic tariff bill of 1886, Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, speaking for the Democratic majority of the House, made the following statement concerning wool:

> When, at the beginning, a revenue was found necessary to our national existence, wool, with everything imported, was taxed. From then until now some qualities of wool have paid some rate of duty. For many years last past the rate on imported wool has been more than double that imposed on other products of the pasture, field, and farm. These other lower tax-protected products have outrun or kept far in advance of the wondrous growth of our population. Wool, protected double as much, has fallen further behind. Wool finds its market at home and its price is increased by a tax, part of the burden of which must be borne by the grower of other farm products, whose surplus in foreign markets fixes his price at home, and to the increase of which his woolgrowing neighbor contributes nothing. The price of wool has been downward for many years; it declined when the tax was highest and the protection greatest. From the statements of the Ohio and other woolgrowers' associations (see S. Ex. Doc. 72, pp. 224–227) it appears that the market price of wool is not three-fourths of the actual cost of production; that with the existing protective rate of 10 cents on the pound the price is still 10 cents below the price at which it can be profitably grown in the great woolgrowing States of Ohio and Pennsylvania. It appears, therefore, that the attempt to make woolgrowing profitable by the use of the taxing power has not been successful, while the tax has been a great national hindrance to the woolen manufacturing industry, as well as a most grievous burden upon all buyers of woolen clothing.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Mills, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House in the Fiftieth Congress, in the year 1888, used this language in reporting the Mills bill to the House:

> We say to the manufacturer we have put wool on the free list to enable him to obtain foreign wools cheaper, make his goods cheaper, and send them into foreign markets and successfully compete with the foreign manufacturer. We say to the laborer in the factory we have put wool on the free list that it may be imported and he may be employed to make the goods that are now made by foreign labor and imported into the United States. We say to the consumer we have put wool on the free list that he may have woolen goods cheaper. We say to the domestic woolgrower we have put wool on the free list to enable the manufacturer to import foreign wool to mix with his and thus enlarge his market and quicken the demand for the consumption of home wool, while it lightens the burden of the taxpayer.
> The duty on wool now prevents nearly all the better classes of wool from coming into the country; the domestic product can supply only about one-half of the amount required for home consumption. The statisticians of the Agricultural Department put the domestic product for the year 1887 at 265,000,000 pounds. Others place it higher, but none at more than half the annual consumption of our people. It requires about 600,000,000 pounds of wool and other fibers manufactured with it, which are now paying duty, to supply the annual demands of home consumption. Why, then, should we keep out by high duties the foreign wools so necessary to the clothing of the people? The Woolgrowers' Association asks us to put on a duty high enough to prevent the importation of all wools. The Wool Manufacturers' Association asks us to put on a duty high enough to keep out all manufactures of wool. If Congress grants this joint request, what are the people to do for woolen clothing? Are the people to be compelled by Congress to wear cotton goods in the winter or go without to give bounties to woolgrowers and wool manufacturers?

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the views of the minority of the Senate Finance Committee on the Mills bill we find this language regarding free wool:

> The minority are firmly convinced that besides the incalculable advantage to the whole country which would result from the placing of wool on the free list it is easily demonstrable that no class will suffer, but that each will reap his share of the benefit. With a consumption of 600,000,000 pounds of raw wool in 1887 and a population of 60,000,000, the average per capita consumption is easily reckoned at 10 pounds, or 50 pounds to the average family of 5 persons, and the northern farmer, constantly exposed to the rigors of our winters, consumes something more than the average.
> It requires from 3 to 4 pounds of raw wool to make a pound of cloth, so that from 12 to 16 pounds of woolen clothing for the family will be seen to be a low average. This is now taxed from 55 to nearly 90 per cent. The manufacturer is not benefited, because his finished product comes into competition with the foreign product made not only from untaxed wool but from cheaper wool.
> It is reckoned that 3½ pounds make a pound of cloth, and when the manufacturer pays 10 cents per pound duty he is supposed to be compensated therefor by the specific duty of 35 cents per pound on his woolen goods. Now, this is on the assumption that 3 pounds of raw wool make 1 of scoured wool—that is, that the wool shrinks in the cleaning not above 66⅔ per cent.
> But many South American and other wools contain more than that proportion of foreign matter, running as high as 75 and 80 per cent. This wool our manufacturer can not buy, because his tax on the cloth would then run from 45 to 60 cents per pound, and his compensatory duty is only 35 cents. Therefore, for these wools the foreign dealer finds no American competitor in the market, and buys them at his own price, and these cheaper wools, untaxed and manufactured abroad, compete here with unfair advantage with our own heavily handicapped woolens, and successfully, too.

Now, if the tax be taken off wools, our manufacturers at once become bidders for this wool against the foreign manufacturer, and, as a certain consequence, the price will rise, and this operates doubly against the foreign manufacturer. He buys his wools dearer and meets untaxed in our markets corresponding grades.

We will import more wools, of course, and in no other way can our great factories prosper, because their capacity is beyond our own wool production. When the factories are turning out more product the employees have steadier work and better wages, and, indirectly, of course, the whole country is benefited.

Under the House bill the manufacturers, with free wool, secure even a higher competitive advantage over the foreign than under the present law or the substitute. The manufacturers will export woolen goods as we now export cotton and leather, and the demand for the wool will better the wool market and encourage increased production, while the average woolgrower himself will reap from cheapened clothing more benefits than he ever did from a tax on his product, which he must himself pay.

The minority, therefore, dissenting from the report of the majority, commend to the Senate and the country the bill of the House of Representatives, No. 9051, as a measure for the reduction of taxes based alike upon justice and good policy.

As the best exposition of the effect of bill H. R. 9051 upon taxation and revenue, the report of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means submitted with the bill to the House of Representatives is hereto appended, with our concurrence.

ISHAM G. HARRIS.
Z. B. VANCE.
D. W. VOORHEES.

Senator James B. Beck, another great Democrat, filed a separate report on the same bill, in which he says:

The Democrats seek cautiously and prudently to reduce all taxation to the revenue standard, so as to take from the people nothing except for public uses and purposes and only such an amount as is needed to support an economically administered Government, at the same time taking care that no injury is done to any domestic industry, even though unduly stimulated by protection, on whose success the employment of any considerable portion of our people depends. They seek to aid our manufacturers by cheapening, wherever it is possible, the raw materials from which finished products are made, so that the markets for them may be enlarged and extended to other countries, and steadier employment, which extended sales necessarily give, be furnished to those who produce them. We seek thus to enable all of our people to obtain what they need of those products with a less expenditure of money they have earned in their various occupations than they can now.

In his report dated March 1, 1892, revising the woolen schedule by placing wool upon the free list and reducing the duty on woolen manufactures to a revenue basis, Mr. Springer, of Illinois, after submitting facts borne out by Government statistics, among other things makes the following statement:

In view of the many disadvantages and embarrassments * * * to which our domestic manufacturers of woolen goods are subjected by reason of the high duties on wool, and in view, also, of the fact that the imposition of such duties has neither benefited the woolgrowers, the wool manufacturers, nor the consumers of the country, Congress should not hesitate to repeal the unnecessary exactions.

Further on in his report he uses this language:

Woolen goods, or goods composed in whole or in part of wool, including carpets, are articles of universal consumption in this country. Their cost to consumers is very great. It is impossible to estimate accurately how much the people of this country expend on this account. Such goods are absolutely necessary to the health and comfort of the people, and they are entitled to supply their wants in this respect at the lowest possible cost. If the existing law, the McKinley law, imposing an average tax of 91 per cent on such goods when imported, does not increase the price of domestic goods of like character, which do not pay any tax whatever, then the manufacturer receives no benefit from protective tariffs and should not object to their repeal. If domestic goods are increased in price by reason of duties imposed upon foreign goods of like character, the extent or amount of this increase is the measure of protection which domestic manufacturers receive.

In the views of the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House in 1890, when the McKinley bill was written, I find the following language used:

Camel's hair, a raw material extensively used in this country in the manufacture of certain kinds of goods, and which has been admitted free of duty for a great many years, is by this bill taken from the free list and subjected to a tax of 12 cents per pound, which is equivalent to 77 per cent ad valorem. During the last fiscal year we imported free of duty 6,648,097 pounds of this material, which is absolutely necessary to enable some of our manufacturing establishments to carry on their business and supply the goods they are now making for their customers; but if this bill passes and the same quantity is imported next year, it will cost the people $797,771.64 in addition to the value of the hair itself. * * * the bill, in fact, increases the rates of duty on all classes of wool imported into this country. These increases have been made principally upon the demand of a few large flock masters in the State of Ohio, and they will be defended by the majority upon the alleged ground that they are beneficial to the farmers of the country who keep sheep on their lands. The fact is, that wool is one of our least important agricultural products in point of actual value, and by comparison with others even in the State of Ohio. It does not amount to more than 3 per cent of the total value of farm products in that State, from which comes the most constant and urgent demand for high rates of duties, and it is still less in other States.

This statement of the views of the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee, which was presented with the majority report on the McKinley tariff bill, was signed by such distinguished Democrats as John G. Carlisle, Roger Q. Mills, Benton McMillin, Clifton R. Breckinridge, and Roswell P. Flower.

Hon. William L. Wilson, of West Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the Democratic House of 1893, in submitting the report of the majority members of that committee with regard to imposing and regulating customs duties upon articles imported into the United States, used the following language in the matter of the woolen tariff:

Of the woolen tariff it may be truly said, as was said of the woolen tariff of 1828, that it is the masterpiece of the ultra restrictionists and exhibits all the worst features of the system. Although the imports of 1892 show an average duty of 95.82 per cent in the woolen schedule, it can not be said that woolen manufacture has been a flourishing industry in this country, or that the American woolgrower has secured remunerative prices for his wool. With free wool we anticipate great benefits to consumers of woolen goods, a revival of the woolen industry, such as that which followed the tariff of 1857, and a steadier and better market for the American woolgrower.

Mr. Chairman, I have read these statements for the purpose of showing that it has been the Democratic policy for a great many years that wool should be placed upon the free list. I have not selected isolated statements in the speeches of various Members of Congress and Senators, for the reason that such statements might be subjected to the criticism that they were only the statements of individual members of the party and not of the party itself. These statements represented the policy of the Democratic Party at the time they were written. Hence, Mr. Chairman, I feel that when I follow in the footsteps of such distinguished Democrats as Roger Q. Mills, William L. Wilson, William R. Morrison, John G. Carlisle, Benton McMillin, Clifton R. Breckinridge, Roswell P. Flower, Isham G. Harris, Z. B. Vance, Daniel W. Voorhees, and James B. Beck, I am on solid Democratic ground. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is admitted by all persons at all familiar with the subject that all civilized nations except the United States have untaxed wool. Hence, in order that our manufacturers may compete in the open markets of the world with an equal chance with foreign woolen manufacturers, then, as a matter of justice, our home manufacturers should at least be placed on an equal footing with foreign manufacturers so far as the raw wool is concerned. For this reason, in the present bill, and in every other bill where a duty is laid on wool, an additional duty is levied on the manufactured article to compensate and repay the manufacturers for the additional price they are compelled to pay for their wool because of the duty on the raw material. This being true, I preferred, when the bill was being discussed and adopted in the Democratic caucus on the first day of the present month, that wool should go on the free list. However, a majority of my Democratic colleagues, in their wisdom, determined otherwise. Since the caucus has spoken, I shall support this bill enthusiastically and sincerely, as it is infinitely a better bill than the present law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic caucus, on the first day of this month, at the time this bill was adopted, also adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy; but in view of the Democratic platform's demand for a gradual reduction of the tariff and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury, as a result of Republican extravagance, a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

Hence, I take it that the duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool in this bill was because of the revenue which this item will produce. In other words, an ad valorem rate of 20 per cent on raw wool will produce more than $13,000,000 in revenue, and the necessity for raising this revenue explains why wool is not on the free list in this bill. And I also take it that just as soon as the state of the public revenues will permit, raw wool will be placed on the free list. We all know that the appropriations have been made, aggregating more than $1,000,000,000, for the next fiscal year, and by a Republican Congress, and the necessary revenue must be raised by this Democratic House.

Robert J. Walker, the great Democrat, who was Secretary of the Treasury in 1845, laid down the following rules, which ought always to be strictly observed in the writing of a Democratic tariff bill:

First. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.

Second. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Third. That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties, or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list free from all duty.

Fourth. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

Fifth. That all minimums and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their places, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluations and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

Sixth. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been some dispute as to what the policy of the Democratic Party has been with regard to free raw materials, so let us examine the record and ascertain the policy of the Democratic Party at all times in the past when the question of free raw materials was being by it considered. I take the position that untaxed raw materials of manufactures has been the policy of the Democratic Party, and desire to submit the proof. In a letter written to the people by Robert J. Walker, November 30, 1867, he uses the following language:

* * * But the tariff of 1846, although it remained much longer in operation than any other tariff and produced much more beneficial results, was susceptible of great improvements, especially in its application to the present condition of our country. First, the raw material of manufactures, as recommended in my first annual report, should be duty free, as is the practice of all enlightened nations. This proposition then made by me was to some extent defeated at that time by Mr. Calhoun. His argument was this: That, so far as no revenue was collected on the raw material of manufactures imported here, we must make good the loss from other articles, and that this was an unjust and unconstitutional discrimination in favor of American manufactures. My answer was, first, that it would never be unconstitutional to permit any one or more articles to come in duty free; second, that Mr. Calhoun had agreed to a large free list in the compromise tariff of 1832; third, that, in point of fact, there was no real loss of revenue, but a real gain, resulting in this way: That as our imports were measured by our exports, specie only liquidating occasional balances, and that as we reduced our exports we were necessarily diminishing our imports and decreasing our revenue. To illustrate this I said that dyestuffs are now free from duty and we have a considerable export of dyed goods to foreign countries; but if we impose a tax upon dyestuffs, which are admitted duty free by all other countries, we shall either annihilate or gradually diminish our exports of dyed goods, correspondingly decrease our imports, and diminish the revenue. This proved to be the case, as is shown by the tables of our exports of dyed goods under the tariff of 1846 as compared with those of 1842. After a close investigation of this subject and after examining the tariffs and the manufacturing establishments of foreign countries in 1851–52 and 1863–64 I am convinced that to admit the raw material of manufactures in all cases duty free would greatly increase our wealth, augment our exports, imports, and revenues, and diminish the burdens of taxation. Let us remember that in taking the duty off the raw material the consumers—the people of the United States—get the manufactured article at a lower rate. This, then, is another step in the reduction of taxes.

Mr. Chairman, you will observe that Mr. Walker says the then distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, defeated the proposition of free raw material in the tariff bill of 1846. Recently I was reading one of Mr. Calhoun's speeches on the tariff and found this expression: That a tariff law should be written so that there should be "equal burdens and equal benefits." Which at first blush is very confusing. But upon analysis from a Democratic standpoint the fallacy should be easily discovered. In the first place, to my mind, it is not Democratic doctrine, for the reason that the Democratic Party has always held to the proposition that any tariff is a tax and any tax is an evil, therefore, they should be laid so that the burden shall be as nearly equally borne, as is possible, by all the people. But when you go one step further, as Mr. Calhoun did, and say that a tariff should also be laid so that the benefits should be equally distributed among the people, then you destroy the doctrine that taxes are burdens, and, therefore, evils, but you say in effect that taxes are good things and put money into the pockets of the people. I say that is a Republican doctrine and the very doctrine that the Republican Party has always carried out in their tariff legislation, and the effect has been that they have legislated money out of the pockets of the people and placed it in the coffers of the special interests. By their tariff legislation they have enriched the few at the expense of the many. By their tariff legislation they have made it possible for one man "to get without earning what another man earns without getting." They have enabled the slimy hand of greed to pick the pockets of the poor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury in 1856, made the following statement regarding free raw materials in his recommendation of the tariff bill of 1857:

In recommending for the third time the remodeling the schedules of the tariff act of 1846, and the reduction of the revenue from customs, I have felt constrained, by a conviction of its propriety, again to recommend as one of the modes of reducing the revenue, that the raw material used in our manufactures should be admitted free of duty.

Under laws of great wisdom and forecast, all manufacturing countries, except the United States, now admit the raw material used in their productions free of duty, thereby giving constant and profitable employment to capital and labor, and enabling their factories to furnish a cheaper article, and better command both the home and foreign market, with beneficial employment to their tonnage in making the exchanges.

The United States, under the Federal Constitution, enjoy perfect freedom of trade with each other in all their agricultural, manufactured, mineral, and other productions. As to the raw material produced in the United States and used in the factories of other countries, those countries under their laws obtain the raw material free, whilst we deny to the raw material produced in those countries and used in our factories the same freedom, thus failing to allow the same constant and profitable employment of our capital and labor, and the same beneficial occupation of the home and foreign market with cheap articles of our own manufacture and the same beneficial employment of our tonnage in making the exchanges.

Further on in this same report this great Democrat says:

The principle is recognized that taxes should only be levied for the purpose of revenue, and I think it clear, inasmuch as the duty is not needed, that the principle would not be violated by authorizing the admission of the raw material used in our manufactures as proposed free of duty. It is suggested in contravention of the legislation of other manufacturing countries, and as an indirect reduction of taxes on the consumer of the home-manufactured article, and may well be considered a step in advance toward free trade.

Hon. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, reporting the Democratic tariff bill of 1886—and he was speaking for the Democratic Party in the lower House of Congress—among other things, said:

The duties intended to be removed by the bill are chiefly those which tax articles used by our own manufacturers, which subject them to a hopeless competition at home and abroad with the manufacturing nations, none of which taxes such materials, that our own manufacturers may successfully compete both at home and abroad with manufacturing nations which do not tax such materials, thus securing markets for the products of hands now idle for want of work to do.

Mr. Mills, in 1888, in reporting the Mills bill to a Democratic House, and which was adopted by a Democratic House, made the following statement regarding free raw materials:

With the markets of the world open to us our manufacturers may run their mills on full time, give constant employment to their laborers, with a steadily increasing rate of wages. With the markets of the world open to the sale of their products they will create an active and constant demand for all the raw materials required in manufactures, which will stimulate, promote, and reward the woolgrowers and the producer of cotton, hemp, flax, hides, ores, and other materials of manufacture. We are the largest producers of cotton in the world, we are second in the production of wool, we put on the markets annually quantities of hemp and flax, and our country is full of ores and coal. What we need is manufactures enough to consume all the annual product of these materials and create an active demand for them, so that our workmen may be constantly employed and receive high prices for their labor. To accomplish this our manufacturers must have markets for the sale of their wares, and these markets are to be found in foreign countries as well as at home. To take the foreign market from the foreign manufacturer we must produce our goods at a lower cost than he can. The principal elements of cost are labor and material. In many of our manufactures the labor cost is lower than in any country in the world, and if the cost of materials were as low here as in foreign countries we could produce our goods more cheaply than they and largely increase our exports to foreign markets. The annual product of our manufactories is now estimated at $7,000,000,000, of which amount we export only about $136,000,000, or less than 2 per cent. If we could obtain free of duty such raw materials as we do not produce and can only be procured in foreign countries, and mix with our home product in the various branches of manufacture, we could soon increase our exports several hundred millions. With untaxed raw materials we could keep our mills running on full time, our operatives in constant employment, and have an active demand for our raw materials in our own factories. If there should be no duty on any materials entering into manufactures, many articles now made abroad would be made at home, which, while it would give more employment to our own labor, would give a better market to many articles which we produce and which enter into manufactures, such as cotton, wool, hemp, flax, and others. With this end in view we have gone as far as we could and done what we could in the present condition of things to place our manufactures upon a firm and unshaken foundation, where they would have advantages over all the manufacturers of the world. Our manufacturers, having the advantage of all others in the intelligence, skill, and productive capacity of their labor, need only to be placed on the same footing with their rivals in having their materials at the same cost in the open markets of the world.

It will be remembered, I am sure, that when this bill reached the Senate from the House, naturally the Republicans were prepared to war against its adoption in that body, and did attack the measure from every possible quarter, but in obedience to the pledge of their party to the people and in compliance with the command from their own consciences, we find supporting this tariff bill in opposition to the forces against them, with all the strength and power that knowledge of being right gives in battle, such tried and true Democratic Senators as Isham G. Harris, Z. B. Vance, Daniel W. Voorhees, and James B. Beck, who were the Democratic members of the committee in the Senate having this bill in charge.

Hon. Richard Coke, in a speech in the United States Senate, I think stated the Democratic position very clearly when he said:

Give us free, untaxed machinery and free raw material, such as coal, ore, wool, jute, and other textile products, these being the bases of all manufacture; a tariff devoted solely to raising revenue for the support of the Government will doubly protect the American workingman's wages and send our cheapened goods without handicap into foreign markets to meet and defy the competition of the world. All the reasons for placing raw materials on the free list apply with twentyfold power to the machinery which manufactures it.

Not one pound of machinery engaged in the manufacture of any article on the dutiable list, or of raw material entering into any such article, should pay a single penny of tariff tax. All incumbrances, every hindrance, every ounce of weight that can be removed from our products should be taken away and American energy, resources, invention, skill, and genius given a fair opportunity of winning primacy in the commerce of the world. When this grand consummation shall occur, as it must sooner or later, and the sooner the better, the products of the workingman's labor, no longer confined to the home market as now, with its fitful seasons of high demand and glut, or to the manipulations of combines and trusts, will find steady sale in all the markets of the world, and thus will be insured steady employment to the labor which it creates.

I find this language, Mr. Chairman, in the Democratic platform of 1888:

The Democratic Party of the United States, in national convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives at the convention of 1884, and indorses the views expressed by President Cleveland in his last earnest message to Congress as the correct interpretation of that platform upon the question of tariff reduction; and also indorses the efforts of our Democratic Representatives in Congress to secure a reduction of excessive taxation.

What did Mr. Cleveland say upon the tariff question in his last earnest message referred to in that statement? Let us read it:

The radical reduction of the duties imposed upon raw material used in manufactures, or its free importation, is of course an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these necessaries. It would not only relieve them from the increased cost caused by the tariff on such material, but the manufactured product being thus cheapened, that part of the tariff now laid upon such product as a compensation to our manufacturers for the present price of raw material could be accordingly modified. Such reduction, or free importation, would serve besides to largely reduce the revenue. It is not apparent how such a change can have any injurious effect upon our manufacturers. On the contrary, it would appear to give them a better chance in foreign markets with the manufacturers of other countries, who cheapen their wares by free material. Thus our people might have the opportunity of extending their sales beyond the limits of home consumption, saving them from the depression, interruption in business, and loss caused by a glutted domestic market, and affording their employees more certain and steady labor, with its resulting quiet and contentment.

But you say we lost the election in 1888. That is true; but when the Republicans came into power they wrote the McKinley law, raising duties and taxing raw materials. These questions were again fought out on the floors of both Houses, the Democrats fighting for free raw materials and a reduction of the duties on manufactures to a revenue basis, while the Republicans in both Houses contended for a protective duty on both raw materials and manufactures. The Republicans had a sufficient number in both Houses to pass the bill, hence it became the law. In the next election, the election of 1892, these questions were fought out before the American people, and the Democrats won. The minority members of the Ways and Means Committee when the McKinley bill was written in the House, being such illustrious Democrats as John G. Carlisle, Roger Q. Mills, Benton McMillin, Clifton R. Breckinridge, and Roswell P. Flower, made a minority report against the adoption of that measure, in which they said:

If it were not for the excessive cost of production in this country, caused by the unnecessary taxation of crude and partially manufactured materials—which are essential in the processes of our industries—we could export and sell every year large quantities of the products of our shops and factories after fully supplying the home demand at reasonable prices. We believe, therefore, that the only manner in which our industries can be helped by legislation at the present time is to exempt from taxation the materials they are compelled to use and to reduce proportionately the taxes on finished products, so that all our farmers, mechanics, and manufacturers may be able to compete on equal terms with those of other countries. This is the policy we advocate and which we desire to see inaugurated and completed just as early and as rapidly as circumstances will permit. The capitalist who has invested his money in these industries, the laborers he employs, and the domestic consumer to whom he sells would all be benefited and nobody would be injured. With untaxed materials it is evident that they could afford to pay their laborers better wages than now and still sell their products to consumers at lower prices than are now charged. Besides this, under such a policy our manufactured products would not be confined, as they are now, almost exclusively to the domestic market, but would enter all the markets of the world and compete successfully with similar products from other manufacturing countries. The opening of these great markets for the sale of our goods would, in our opinion, give constant employment not only to the thousands of laborers now engaged in our manufacturing industries, but would create a demand for many thousands in addition, and unless we are greatly deceived, the time would soon come when there would be no importations of finished articles into this country except such as our own people, for climatic reasons, could not produce or do not desire to produce. The only certain and proper way to stop importations of such products is to make them ourselves so cheaply that no foreign competitor can afford to meet us in our own markets, and this we could undoubtedly do with free materials.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman refers to the fact that in 1888, after the passage through the House of the Mills bill, placing raw material on the free list, the Republicans won in the next election. The gentleman does not explain the whys, but does state that in 1892, the McKinley bill having been passed in the meantime, putting a tax on raw materials, and the tariff being the subject of discussion and the issue in 1892, the Democrats won, advocating reduction of the tariff and free raw material.

I wish to place in the RECORD right here what has always been ignored by our Republican friends whenever they discuss the defeat of the Democrats in 1888, and to say that that campaign, in my recollection, hinged more on the bloody-shirt issue than any campaign since the war, almost. A great number of pensions were vetoed by President Cleveland, and it was intimated to him that a trip by him to St. Louis would be unsafe. Taking advantage of that action, the Republican Party pitched that campaign largely on the war issues and appealed to war prejudices and sectional feeling. The Democrats were defeated in 1888 not by the Mills bill, but by the old war issues.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I thank the gentleman for the statement.

Hon. William M. Springer, of Illinois, in reporting the Democratic tariff bill of 1892, used this language in discussing the question of free raw materials. Mr. Springer was discussing the duty on wool, when, among other things, he said:

The imposition of this duty, like the imposition of all other duties on raw materials, works a double injury. In the first place, it imposes an unnecessary burden upon the consumers, who in the end pay all the duties with profits added, and in the second place, it destroys the power of the domestic manufacturer to compete with his foreign rival in the production of the goods into which the taxed material is converted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what the Hon. William L. Wilson, the brilliant Democrat and distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee when the Wilson bill was written, in 1894, said on the question of free raw materials. Mr. Wilson said:

We begin our task by an effort to free from taxation those things on which the industrial prosperity and growth of our country so largely depend. Of all the reductions made in this bill there are none in their benefit to the consumer, none in their benefit to the laborer, that can be compared with the removal of the taxes from the materials of industry. We have felt that we could not begin a thorough reform of the existing system, built up, as I have shown, story by story, until it has pierced the clouds, except by a removal of all taxation on the great materials that lie at the basis of modern industry, and so the bill proposes to put on the free list wool, iron ore, coal, and lumber. I have already said, Mr. Chairman, that I believe no tariff bill could carry any benefit to the American people comparable to the proposed release from taxation of the materials of industry. Better give a workingman untaxed materials to work with than give him untaxed clothing to wear. Better give him untaxed materials on which to exercise his industry than untaxed and cheapened necessaries of life. His wages depend upon the product of his labor. Whatever goes as a tax into the material he uses is a diminution of the wages of the laboring man. As you cheapen his materials you widen the market for his products. With untaxed iron and steel in its cruder forms, or even in the humbler beginning of the ore, with untaxed wool and coal and lumber you enable him to put his finished products on the market at prices that will rapidly and indefinitely increase the number of his consumers, and in this way you secure him steady employment, increasing wages, and that personal independence he can never enjoy in a closed, high-tariff market. Mr. Chairman, I well remember in the first months of my service in this House, during the debate on the first Morrison bill, listening to a speech of Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, himself a great miner of iron and coal and a great manufacturer and employer of labor, in which he proved by a masterly reasoning and array of facts that in the organization of modern industry the only protection of labor against corporate and other capital was in its own organizations and its own trade-unions, and that the only field in which labor organizations can flourish, the only arena on which trade-unions can manifest their power to protect the manhood of their members and the wages of their labor, is a country which throws down the bars and gives the workingman untaxed raw material to work with.

Mr. Bryan, in a speech on this floor in 1892, made the following very lucid statement on this question of free raw materials:

Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I believe we can make no permanent progress in the direction of tariff reform until we free from taxation the raw materials which lie at the foundation of our industries. It also takes away entirely those specific or compensatory duties which were added to the ad valorem rates to enable the manufacturers to transfer to the back of the consumer the burden which a tariff on raw materials places on the manufacturer. The reason why I believe in placing raw material on the free list is because any tax imposed on raw material must at last be taken from the consumer of the manufactured article. You can compose no tax for the benefit of the producer of the raw material which does not find its way through the various forms of manufactured product and at last press with accumulated weight upon the person who uses the finished product. Another reason why raw material should be placed on the free list is because that is the only method by which one business can be favored without injury to another. We are not in that case imposing a tax for the benefit of the manufacturer, but we are simply saying to the manufacturer, "We will not impose any burden upon you." When we give to the manufacturer free raw material and free machinery, we give to him, I think, all the encouragement which people acting under a free government like ours can legitimately give to a free people.

Mr. Chairman, if Mr. Cleveland were alive he would be a Bryan man and Mr. Bryan would be a Cleveland man on this question.

My friends, you may dispute whether free raw materials is a good policy, but you can not deny that it has been the policy of the Democratic Party for more than 50 years.

Mr. Chairman, it has always been the contention of Democrats that if wool were placed on the free list the consumers of woolen clothes would get their clothes cheaper. Now, I am going to prove by such distinguished Republicans as Thomas B. Reed, Julius C. Burrows, SERENO E. PAYNE, JOHN DALZELL, Albert J. Hopkins, and John H. Gear that the Democratic position is now and always has been correct. These distinguished Republicans filed a minority report on the Wilson bill in 1894, in which they used the following language, which may be found at page 336, Senate Document No. 547, Sixtieth Congress, second session:

The majority claims it has conferred a great blessing upon the wool manufacturers by giving them "free raw material." We find this gift is one which the manufacturers have not asked and which they distinctly repudiate as an advantage to themselves. If we could assume for the moment some theoretical benefit to be derived from free wool, it is not the manufacturer who can reap that assumed advantage. If he can make his goods any cheaper because of free wool, he must sell them just as much cheaper, and from that point of view he gains nothing, as his position remains unchanged.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, they say, "If he can make his goods any cheaper because of free wool, he must sell them just as much cheaper, and from that point of view he gains nothing."

Mr. Chairman, this sentence shows the whole theory of Republican tariff laws. They write their tariff laws so that some special interest may gain some advantage over the rest of the people. This principle of Republican tariff making is strongly illustrated in the wool schedule of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, which this bill seeks to repeal. The woolen schedule in the Payne-Aldrich law is substantially the same as in the Dingley law of 1897. Statistics show that in 1905 our mills produced $142,000,000 worth of woolens, $165,000,000 worth of worsteds, $95,000,000 worth of knit goods, or in all $400,000,000. Now, we imported $23,000,000. We produced about 18 times as much as we imported, and while the high rates in the Dingley law and in the Payne-Aldrich law gave the Government $20,000,000 in duties the consumers were charged the same rates on domestic goods, the Government receiving nothing, while the manufacturers of woolen goods pocketed $360,000,000 profit, and this at a cost to the consumer of $760,000,000 for $400,000,000 worth of goods. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the startling fact reveals itself, when contemplating the iniquities of the Republican protective-tariff system, that the American consumer, who is the American laborer, instead of receiving protection and benefit from the Republican tariff, as is alleged, is in reality sandbagged, and the footpads of protection steal upon him under the guise of friends. Mr. Chairman, I want to state right here that, from the statistics of the year 1905 with regard to tax on woolens and the given sum collected that year by the Government as revenue from such tax, we find an almost unbelievable discrimination in favor of the manufacturer and against the Government and against the American consumer. We find, Mr. Chairman, that for every dollar of revenue realized by this Government from the duty on woolens the citizen and consumer is taxed and compelled to pay the sum of $18. For every $18 the consumer pays as a tax on woolens under the present Republican protective system the Government realizes only one single dollar in revenue. It is not difficult to calculate who is receiving the protection under the Republican system.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard some discussion among Democrats as to what are raw materials, and I believe David B. Hill gave just about as good a definition of the term as I have seen when he says:

> Raw materials are those productions which are in their lowest and crudest form when they enter commerce.

I think coal, lumber, iron ore, cotton, wool, raw silk, raw rubber, and so forth, are raw materials. Now, I have heard some distinguished Democrats make a statement which was very confusing to me, and which is to the effect that wool is the finished product of the woolgrower, but that it is the raw material of the carder; and after it had been carded and made into rolls it was then the finished product of the carder, but at the same time it was the raw material of the spinner, which became his finished product after it was spun; but yet it was the raw material of the weaver, and became his finished product when made into cloth, but still was the raw material of the tailor. Now, I confess that this has been a confusing problem to me, and I have been for some time trying to find out where this theory originated. Since I had heard distinguished Democrats make this statement I naturally began to read what the great Democrats of the past had said and written upon the subject, but I failed to find such a theory advanced by any of them. Then I began to run down Republican authorities on Republican doctrines, and, lo, I found where the chief high priest of protection for the last 30 years in this country had advanced this confusing theory.

Listen to the inspired oracle of this anointed priest:

> The doctrine of free raw materials, as advocated by tariff reformers, is a difficult one to enforce in legislation. In the usual division of labor, the finished product of one man becomes the raw material of his industrial successor.

Mr. Chairman, this language was used by the distinguished ex-Senator from Rhode Island when he was slaughtering the Mills bill in the Senate in 1888. And I think it would be well hereafter for Democrats, when they make this argument, to give Mr. Aldrich due credit for having originated it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know if they had done this in the past they would have saved me considerable time spent in looking it up.

Now, my friends, I would say to Democrats, beware of quoting this Aldrich doctrine as Democratic doctrine, for it is not, but, on the contrary, it is Republican doctrine.

Mr. Chairman, if I were writing a tariff bill I would first place on the free list all raw materials out of which are manufactured the necessaries of life in order that the people could buy these necessaries cheaper than if the raw materials were taxed. Why should not the raw materials out of which the necessaries of life are manufactured be placed on the free list? I dare say there is not a Member on either side of this House who would vote for a duty on wool if wool were not produced in this country. If the necessity for revenue demanded that a revenue duty be placed on any raw materials, I would place this duty on such raw materials as rubber, silk, and such other raw materials as are not produced in this country, and for two reasons: First, because as they would be noncompeting articles, whatever the people might pay for the privilege of consuming them would go directly into the Public Treasury and not into the pockets of the special interests; second, for the reason that when it became necessary to either raise or lower the duties on these articles it would not disturb the business conditions of the country. I would place the highest duties on the luxuries of life, the next highest on the comforts of life, and then I would place on the free list just as many of the necessaries of life as possible.

Mr. Chairman, I think this would have been a better bill if it had provided for untaxed wool, for then there would have been greater reductions of duties in the finished products. However, it is a great reduction of the duties as laid in the Payne-Aldrich law; a reduction from an average of more than 90 per cent ad valorem to about 42 per cent ad valorem, which is a reduction of about 53 per cent. One of the best things in this bill is the fact that it abolishes all specific and compound duties appearing in the woolen schedule in the present law and substitutes therefor ad valorem duties. Under this bill imported articles of little value will pay a small duty, while articles of greater value will pay proportionately a larger duty. Not so in the present law, where blankets, flannels, and clothing are taxed, not according to value, but according to weight or square yard. For example, the Payne-Aldrich law has a provision like this:

> On blankets and flannels for underwear composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be the same as the duty imposed by this section on 2 pounds of unwashed wool of the first class, or 22 cents, and in addition thereto 30 per cent ad valorem, etc.

Here you find a compound duty composed of a specific and an ad valorem duty combined. Under a tariff like this the cheaper blankets used by the poor are taxed higher than the finer and more expensive blankets used by the rich. This discrimination against the poor and in favor of the rich may be found throughout the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. Chairman, if any State legislature in this Union should pass a revenue law to raise money to run the State government by placing a provision in such law to tax all houses in the State of the value of not more than $20,000 the sum of $100 annually, what do you suppose the people of that State would think of it? It can readily be seen that under such a taxing system the man who owned the $1,000 house would pay annually 10 per cent in State taxes on his investment, while the man who owned the $20,000 house would pay only one-half of 1 per cent. I dare say no political party could put in force any such statute in any State of the Union and remain in power. Yet this is the very policy the Republican Party pursues in writing the tariff—revenue—laws of the country. What is true of blankets and flannels is also true of woolen clothing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I would say to those who believe as I do that this bill does not go quite far enough, be not dismayed, for we should remember that it took the people of Great Britain 40 years to rid themselves of this vicious system of protection. Gentlemen no doubt remember that the agitation for a reduction of the tariff in England began in 1820, when that country was suffering from a highly protective system. How were the reductions in England's tariff laws brought about? Not all at once, but gradually. The first reduction was accomplished under the leadership of Huskisson in the years 1824 to 1827. The agitation for still greater reductions continued, when in the years 1841, 1842, and 1843, under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel, a new tariff bill was passed through Parliament making great reductions in the then tariff law which had been written by Huskisson in the years 1824 to 1827. The next step taken by Peel was the repeal of the protective tariff on corn, or the abolition of the famous corn laws, that his people might have cheaper bread in order to sustain life. Finally, the last stage in the reduction of the protective system of Great Britain was accomplished under the leadership of that great English statesman, William E. Gladstone, in the years 1853 to 1860, when practically free trade with the world was established in Great Britain. Hence, it will be seen that it took more than 40 years under the leadership of three of England's greatest and most patriotic statesmen to destroy the system of graft and special privilege known as protection.

Mr. Chairman, now that we have begun the work, I pray God that the people of this country will be able to shake off the shackles of this monstrous system in a much shorter period. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY] such time as he may desire.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Chairman, I have always been a firm believer in the wisdom of protection in the United States and I still believe in the protective-tariff policy of the Republican Party; but realizing, as I do, the utter futility of an argument in favor of the maintenance of that policy before the House of Representatives as now constituted, I shall not venture to trespass upon the valuable time of the committee longer than to submit a word or two concerning the woolgrowing industry. I feel quite certain that a few observations from me along this line will not interfere to any appreciable extent with the punctilious observance of the solemn ceremonial agreed upon in the Democratic caucus for the final disposition of this measure, and, as a mere incident thereto, the destruction of the woolgrowing industry in the Western States, providing the bill should become a law, which, to say the least, according to present indications, is extremely problematical.

I think we fully understand over here that this revision is taking place without any regard whatever for any industry that may be affected by the proposed changes in this schedule. I heard a Member on that side the other day congratulate the members of the Ways and Means Committee for their "untiring effort to preserve the great sheep industry," and the day before that a prominent Democratic Member of this House and member of the Ways and Means Committee admitted that the price of wool would be lower if this bill passed than it would be if the present duty of 11 cents were retained. Some of us had already surmised that such would be the effect if the bill should become a law. According to the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture there were 4,800,000 sheep in Montana in 1910, a greater number than can be found in any other State in the Union.

The wool product, consisting of washed and unwashed wool, amounted to 33,600,000 pounds, or 12,096,000 of scoured wool, the shrinkage being about 64 per cent. Now, in view of the manifest importance of this great industry to my constituents, I trust that I shall be pardoned if I decline to participate in this alleged benefit. Your scheme of revision does not look very good to me, and I might also add that it does not look any better to about 9,000 men directly interested in woolgrowing in my State, to say nothing of thousands of other people engaged in other lines of business who would be injuriously affected by the destruction of this great industry.

Although it might be said that my perceptive faculties are slightly on the bias on account of my environment at home, I want to say to you, my good friends across the aisle, that this bill looks to me like a sort of bounty law, intended as a first aid to Argentina, Cape Colony, New South Wales, Australia, and New Zealand, and to serve the beneficent purpose of exterminating sheep in the United States.

Now, I might go on and demonstrate the utter inadequacy of the rates in this bill from the standpoint of protection to the woolgrower, but that would do no good, for you have already admitted it, and you have gone further and declared that the reason you have not placed wool upon the free list was because of the revenue it afforded to help overcome a deficit in the Treasury, which does not exist. You are now engaged in the rather difficult undertaking of presenting for approval of the country a sample of Democratic tariff revision without hearings and without any evidence of recent origin.

In view of the fact that no hearings have been held, and consequently no proper investigations could take place, it seems to me that a serious mistake has been made by gentlemen on that side in refusing to postpone revision until the tariff commission could complete its work and make a full report to Congress concerning this complicated schedule, which affects probably not less than 500,000 people engaged in the various industries therein represented. I do not doubt that the woolgrowers of my State would be perfectly willing to rest their case upon facts gathered by the Tariff Board.

For my part, I thoroughly believe in the efficacy of a tariff board or commission, and shall continue so to believe until it has been demonstrated that accurate and useful information can not be obtained from that source. I have never heard anybody on this side of the Chamber assert or pretend to claim that the tariff measure enacted during the Sixty-first Congress was all that it should be; even its most ardent advocates have never so stated.

I believe it represents a sincere and honest effort on the part of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee to frame a tariff bill in accordance with the time-honored principle of protection to American labor and American industries. That the members of that committee were indefatigable in their endeavors to obtain reliable information relating to the various schedules has never been denied by anybody, so far as I know, who was qualified to express an opinion on the subject. After months of toil and the compilation of 10,000 pages of testimony the bill was finally reported and passed. About three weeks were devoted to the measure at this end of the Capitol and about three months at the other end. The debates on the bill in the other body were, it seems to me, unduly acrimonious and long continued, and it is therefore no occasion for surprise that the people of the country in some localities either passively accepted the bill or else were actively opposed to it. The President said that it was the best Republican tariff bill ever passed, and many high up in the counsels of the party were of the same opinion. No doubt certain schedules can and will be improved through information that will be furnished by the Tariff Commission, which was created by the Republican Party.

But it has been said repeatedly by the enemies of protection that the revision of the tariff in 1909 by the Republicans was not a scientific revision. Well, if after 12 months of investigation and many weeks consumed by the committee in hearings the result was altogether a failure in that respect, then what can be said to justify the sudden appearance here of this taunting menace to the woolgrowers and farmers of the country, who have petitioned this body frequently during the present session to withhold action for a few weeks longer until the tariff commissioners, who, with their assistants, are now working with all possible expedition and diligence, can furnish this House with some definite information upon which to base a real revision of this and other schedules in the tariff law? I am aware that the Tariff Board has been criticized for not bringing in a report at an earlier date. It has been alleged that the delay is inexcusable, since the board was established nearly two years ago.

I do not think the tariff commissioners need any defense from me. They are abundantly able to take care of themselves, as is plainly evidenced by the great amount of work they have accomplished since they were appointed in September, 1909; and that is especially noteworthy when we take into account the further fact that the board was required to cooperate with the State Department concerning questions of discrimination by foreign nations until April, 1910.

It was not until that date that the board was at liberty to consider industrial problems in connection with the tariff law of our own country. This great work is in the hands of able and experienced men who have under their direction an efficient corps of trained experts and statisticians. To one who has made inquiry as to what progress is being made, the enormous amount of statistical information already compiled and classified is almost beyond comprehension.

Unquestionably it is one of the most arduous tasks ever undertaken by this Government, and every proper encouragement and opportunity ought to be given the board to ascertain the facts. I believe that we now have a Tariff Board able to deal intelligently and efficiently with the great economic questions with which it is confronted, and I confidently expect that the result of these investigations will justify the expenditure of the money and labor required. But thus far, in my judgment, no good reason has been advanced on that side for the refusal to postpone action upon this schedule until the board can submit its findings in December. The record of the woolgrowing industry in this country is reasonably satisfactory, notwithstanding the uncertainty that has existed, and still exists, as a result of tariff agitation. Statistics show that during the last 13 years the world's supply of sheep has decreased about 40,000,000 head, although the increase in population during that period has been about 95,000,000. During that same period the flocks of the United States have greatly increased.

In the year 1897 there were in this country 36,819,000 sheep, having a farm value of $67,021,000. In 1910 the number had increased to 57,216,000 and the value to $233,664,000. This makes a showing of 20,397,000 more sheep in the United States in 1910 than in 1897, with an increase in value of $166,643,000, an increase of about 50 per cent in numbers and of nearly 250 per cent in value. What the woolgrowers of this country need and must have in order to maintain their industry upon a paying basis is adequate protection, free from tariff tinkering. Give them that kind of encouragement and it will not be a great many years before the United States will supply most of the wool needed for home consumption. Last year we produced 321,362,750 pounds of wool and imported about the same amount, or 312,131,171 pounds. I find, however, that the latter figures are for 1909. I believe the importations for 1910 were about 256,000,000 pounds. There have been six tariff revisions since 1861, and it is claimed, and actual experience has demonstrated, that every time the duty on wool has been placed below the present rate a general depression in business has followed and has continued until the rate has been restored or placed above 10 cents per pound. During the last four years of the act of 1867, with a rate of 12½ cents, there was an increase in the number of sheep of 25 per cent; the act of 1883 continued in existence for a period of about six years, with a rate of 10 cents per pound, and the decrease amounted to 16 per cent; the act of 1890 continued for nearly four years; the rate was 11 cents and the rate of increase was 10 per cent. Under the act of 1894 wool was on the free list, and the decrease amounted to about 21 per cent, and during 12 years of the Dingley law, with 11 cents per pound on wool of the first class, the rate of increase, as heretofore demonstrated, was nearly 50 per cent.

Under the Payne law the old rate of 11 cents on wool of the first class was continued, and the flocks of the country have increased 1,132,000 head from 1909 to 1910, and the increase in farm value of sheep amounted to $41,032,000, thereby furnishing additional proof of the statements heretofore made. It is said by experts in tariff matters, that had the rate of 12½ cents under the law of 1867 been maintained for 30 years the woolgrowers of the United States would have been able to supply the needs of the entire country, but there was a great demand then, as there is to-day, for reduction in rates. In 1883 we had a duty of 10 cents, although the cost of labor and production generally was much less then than it is now—at least 25 per cent lower—nevertheless the industry languished and there was a resulting decrease in the number of sheep of about 21 per cent. It is exceedingly difficult to state precisely what is adequate protection, but it seems to me that experience ought to enable us to determine approximately what rates of duty are necessary to maintain the woolgrowing industry upon a fairly remunerative basis. Experience has taught us, and it has been demonstrated repeatedly by illustrious advocates of the protective-tariff system, that such rates as are proposed in this bill can have but one result, and that is the complete destruction of the woolgrowing industry in the United States.

Comparative cost of production with leading woolgrowing countries:

AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.

Climatic conditions, aside from drought periods, are conducive to both wool production and a heavy percentage of lambs. No winter feed required.

Wages of herders, average per month, about	$17.00
Cost of shearing, per head, about	.05
Actual cost of running sheep, per head, per year, about	.36

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

Climatic conditions are mild and a continuous growth prevails the entire year. No winter feed required.

Herders' wages per month, about	$15.00
Cost of shearing, per head	.04
Actual cost of running sheep, per head, per year	.39

The mild climate produces prolific growth of wool and insures heavy increases to flock in lambs.

CAPE COLONY.

Climatic conditions are much the same as in the Argentine Republic: land values are high; growth of grass not so prolific; no winter feed required; wages about the same; increased value of land increases the cost of maintenance per head per year to 56 cents.

UNITED STATES.

Actual cost of running sheep per head per year, $1.40. This does not include the cost of providing winter feed at an additional expense of from $1 to $1.50 per head, according to locality.

Number and farm value of sheep in the United States, 1897–1910.

Resolutions adopted at a meeting of woolgrowers of eastern Montana:

Resolved, That we reaffirm our belief in the American system of protection and indorse the application of its principles as embodied in the arrangement of Schedule K as applicable to wool duties, and recognize that after departure has been made from the principles therein contained disaster has befallen in every instance the industry of woolgrowing. The growers of wool need and are entitled to protective duties equally with the manufacturers of wool. The industry of woolgrowing in Montana, at the present time, represents in the aggregate an investment in lands, ranch equipments, and improvements, market value of live-stock holdings, etc., more than $45,000,000, employing in the constant care of its holdings some 8,700 employees, at an average wage of $40 per month, with board, aggregating $3,400,000 as its annual pay roll in wages, with an attendant charge exceeding $1,000,000 per year at $12 per month for food supply of employees, with additional charge of $450,000, representing approximately the amount of money paid in the early months of summer for shearing, being an average of 9 cents per head on the sheep in the State, which, together with its annual pay roll, represents the highest average cost of labor paid in wool production in the world.

Therefore we are justified in protesting against being called upon to allow the growing of wool to be placed in free competition with lower cost producing prices in other parts of the world, a condition with which it is impossible for us to comply and maintain our business existence.

We recognize that in the wool and woolen schedules the entire country is interested, and should be more closely united than upon any other part of the tariff law, and we call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to exert themselves to the utmost against free foreign invasion of our markets and to resist ill-founded attacks of various doctrinaires upon a great system upon which not only business security rests, but the happiness and prosperity of countless depending people.

We heartily and earnestly indorse the Tariff Commission appointed by President Taft, and pending investigation of this board we feel that agitation should be held in abeyance until its findings are reported. As growers we court the fullest investigation and ask for the opportunity of submitting before this board and the American people absolutely trustworthy information covering the cost of producing wool and mutton, by which we hope to maintain the justice to our claim to reasonable consideration in applying tariff schedules.

We protest against the passage of the reciprocity bill in its present form by which the interests of Montana, we believe, would be unquestionably injured, inasmuch as all those products, such as live stock, grain, and wool, which constitute the chief exports of the State, are placed directly in competition with lower cost of production, while most things which are used in farming and ranching in the State are carefully provided for with protective schedules.

We are therefore unable to see any attendant benefits coming to the relief of consumers in this State in return for the losses sustained by live stock and agricultural interests.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. SISSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11019, to revise the wool schedule, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

The motion was agreed to; and, pending the announcement of the result of the vote, the Speaker designated the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. CANDLER, to act as Speaker pro tempore for the evening session.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CANDLER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11019.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill to revise the wool schedule, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, it is with a great deal of pride that I rise on the floor this evening to address the House on the question that is now before it. The pride is caused from seeing every seat on the Republican side and most of those on the Democratic side filled, and the galleries filled to overflowing. [Applause]. Mr. Chairman, I am not conceited enough to think that they are all here to listen to my feeble efforts, but it shows the great interest felt in the question by not only the Members of this body, but by the people at large, and while the people fully realize that this question already has been settled in caucus before it ever had any discussion or before any information had been given on this subject, while that is fully realized, still they are willing to come here and listen to this futile debate, and, I repeat, it gives me great pride to address this audience to-night.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the debate on this bill with much interest, and much has been said that gives food for thought, and much that gives cause for research. I was deeply interested in the speech the other day of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY]. I think it is as strong a speech as has been delivered in this debate to sustain the position of the majority. I was especially interested in his reference to the effect of the Walker tariff in 1846, and in the statistics submitted therewith, and particularly as they pertain to the decade from 1850 to 1860, and I want to read from the speech of the gentleman from Georgia as it appears in the RECORD:

WALKER TARIFF LIVED 11 YEARS.

Mr. Chairman, it would seem our friends of to-day are not even original in the forebodings in which they indulge. Let us see what followed the forebodings which were indulged in in 1846, when the Walker tariff was being considered. In the first place, it was enacted into law and lived for 11 years. But one other tariff law in all the history of this country lived any longer, and that was the Dingley law, that lived for 12 years. What was the effect of the Walker tariff? Listen to these figures: In the decade from 1820 to 1830 the wealth of this country increased 41 per cent. In the decade from 1830 to 1840 the wealth of this country increased 42 per cent. In the decade from 1850 to 1860, during the operation of the Walker tariff, the increase in wealth reached the astounding percentage of 126.45 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BRANTLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman tell us that, after we have lived as we have from 1860 to the present time, the wealth of the United States has increased from $1,600,000,000 in 1860 to $125,000,000,000 in 1910?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not the figures before me, but if my friend states that those are the figures, I am not prepared to take issue with him. He can incorporate them into his speech.

Mr. CANNON. But I wanted to get them in at this point.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Unfortunately, I have not the figures before me.

Mr. CANNON. But I state that that is so.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, we all rejoice at the growth of our country from 1860 until now, whatever that growth may be; but however great it is, the fact still remains that under the operation of the Walker tariff, which gentlemen at that time said would ruin and destroy this country, the wealth of the country in 10 years' time under its beneficent operation increased more than 126 per cent.

All classes and all business thrived under that tariff.

FACTS EXPLODE PROSPERITY CLAIMS.

Mr. Chairman, after hearing the foregoing figures and statement, I could not resist looking into the facts to see if the country and the Government were as prosperous during the decade mentioned—from 1850 to 1860—as the gentleman's remarks would indicate. I found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Congresses during that decade much that was interesting, not only to the effect of the Walker tariff on the business of the country and the conduct of the Government, but also some interesting information on the question and effect of ad valorem duties.

Now, I desire to read some excerpts from the reports of the Secretaries of the Treasury from 1850 to 1860, and, mind you, these reports are, with one exception, from Democratic officials and all reported to Democratic Congresses. I believe that if the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber will give their attention for a little while they will hear the opinion of one official of practical experience on the respective effects of ad valorem and specific duties that, in my judgment, would be well worth consideration at the present time, and also learn that the increase of wealth in a decade is not always proof that the Government is necessarily prosperous at the same time.

Mr. Chairman, this large audience in the gallery, no doubt, would like to hear all this matter which I could read from the reports of the Secretaries of the Treasury from 1850 to 1860, but, as much as I would like to please them, I will not weary the patience of the House by reading them all this evening, but will insert them in the RECORD, along with extracts from the first message of President Buchanan, wherein he gave the condition of the Treasury and the country, which I think will prove that the decade from 1850 to 1860 was not one of unalloyed prosperity. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Chairman, in 1850, Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, made a report to the Congress concerning the question of ad valorem duties and the effect that they were having on the Government's revenues.

THEORY RIGHT IF ALL WERE HONEST.

I might say right there, Mr. Chairman, that the theory of ad valorem duties is undoubtedly right. If all men were honest, if all of our people and the foreigners were honest, so that goods were sent in at their true valuation, there is no doubt but that an ad valorem duty would be just and proper. But all history shows that mankind is prone to take advantage of Government, be it by tariff smuggling or by smuggling articles across the border to evade duties. That has been history as far back as we have any account of smuggling and tariffs and there is no doubt that until human nature changes, it will be the condition for a thousand years to follow. Consequently an ad valorem tariff, while all right in theory, really tends to make people practice dishonesty. And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in regard to the Canadian tariff to-day, which is largely ad valorem, the only thing that enables it to keep up under ad valorem rates is because it has very high duties, indeed, proportionate with its revenue needs and traffic. I have had considerable experience in exporting into Canada myself.

Some 13 or 14 years ago I had men write to me from the city of Winnipeg, wanting me to ship pears to them in Canada. I had been over in St. Paul, and there had told the dealers I had some fine pears out in my country four or five thousand boxes, which means several carloads. A gentleman from Winnipeg was there. He went home and told the dealers there, and I had letters inquiring about pears. This gentleman had asked me what I would be willing to furnish pears for at my station f. o. b., and I had told him. I received letters from there telling me if my pears were according to the grades and standard, and so forth, that run in that business, they would like to have some of them.

But they said, "We suppose you are acquainted with our system of collecting customs duties, and we want to tell you that we could not buy these pears from you at your price and pay the ad valorem duty of 20 per cent on that valuation. Unless those goods could be billed out to us at a certain figure, we could not use them."

SYSTEM BREEDS DISHONESTY.

Then they went on to explain that the custom was universal to undervalue that product.

We will say these pears were 80 cents or $1 a box and the ad valorem duty was 20 per cent. There would be at $1 a box 20 cents duty, and at 80 cents a box 16 cents duty. If some other man got the same grade of goods in there at a valuation of 40 cents or 50 cents a box, they could not compete with the dealer who had this advantage, which is apparent enough to all of us. But the remarkable fact, gentlemen, was that they had not formed combinations and agreed on uniform prices at which goods should be invoiced for customs. At that time several of them suggested different prices at which I should bill out the goods if I sold to them.

Nowadays men get together on all such propositions as that. If a man who was importing goods was honest, and let his goods come in at their true valuation, say of $1 a box for pears or apples, paying 20 cents duty on them, and had to compete with a man who was not honest, and who got his goods in at 50 cents valuation and had only 10 cents a box duty to pay at the customhouse, the dishonest man could undersell his honest competitor and destroy his business.

Now, gentlemen, they tell you that by having competent inspectors it is possible to check all that. It is stated that they examine the goods, and they do perfunctorily, but it is impossible, especially in general merchandise, where all classes and kinds of goods are coming in, intelligently to examine and value it all. You could not get inspectors who could give you the true valuation of all such goods. While some frauds might be checked and legal duties collected, immense sums would be lost to the Government. Indeed, it is safe to say that 75 per cent of goods will come in with undervaluations under ad valorem conditions, and will be demoralizing to those who try to ship in goods at the regular tariff rates, the latter finding themselves unable to compete with those who have undervalued.

Even though ad valorem duty is correct in theory, as long as human nature is as it is, and as long as man is constituted as he is, any government will be in hot water all the time over its revenues if it attempts to get all its tariff revenue by the ad valorem method. This statement is borne out by what Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury from 1850 to 1853, stated in his report to Congress that I intended reading when I made this digression.

FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE.

Under the subhead of "Frauds upon the revenue" Mr. Corwin says:

In obedience to the act of the 10th of May, 1800, whereby it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury "to digest, prepare, and lay before Congress, at the commencement of every session, a report on the subject of finance, containing estimates of the public revenue and public expenditures, and plans for improving or increasing the revenue from time to time," I feel it my duty, in view of our necessarily increased expenditures and maturing liabilities, to submit to the wisdom of Congress such suggestions as the present state of our country and the revenues seem to demand.

We can not overlook the fact, in our estimates of future revenue, that the last three or four years have been exceptional ones; that we are indebted for our large revenues in part to the famine, the revolutions, and the broken-down markets of Europe. The ease with which the low duties under the act of 1846 may be reduced still lower by successful frauds and undervaluations, combined with the causes just stated, has induced a large excess of importations. But the markets of Europe are recovering their tone; the effects of the famine are passing away; our country is filled, it is believed, to excess with foreign goods; and it would be contrary to all reasonable expectation to look for a continuance of these large importations.

The provisions of the act of July, 1846, have been found insufficient for the prevention of frauds and undervaluations. The extent to which they have been carried, and the degree in which they have been rendered systematic and complete, have been highly detrimental to the revenue. The department has long given the subject of these frauds its most earnest attention, and exhausted all its authority for their prevention and detection; but they are still of such magnitude, and so demoralizing in their effect, as to demand the immediate interposition of Congress.

A special communication on this subject was made to the Senate on the 26th September last, in answer to a resolution of that body, and as that embraced much that would otherwise be incorporated in this report, a copy thereof is annexed (marked "T").

That numerous frauds by means of undervaluations have been and continue to be systematically perpetrated, and that they are confined neither to one class of articles, one market, nor one port of the United States, this department has an accumulation of the most undeniable evidence. This proof, consisting of a great variety of details, will, with great pleasure, be submitted to Congress or any of its committees that may be charged with the subject.

Through the vigilance of the appraisers vast numbers of advances upon invoices have been made. At Boston and New York the number so advanced, from January, 1849, to October 1, 1850, amounts to more than 4,000 (Table U), ranging from 5 per cent to upward of 400 per cent.

Statement V is an importation of fruit, and is cited as exhibiting not only the system of fraudulent undervaluations, but the inequality of values at the different ports of the United States under the present tariff act. The fruit was shipped by the same house, about the same time—one cargo arriving at Philadelphia, one at New York, and one at Boston—the quality and invoice value being the same. At Philadelphia it passed at the invoice value, at New York the appraisers advanced it 75 per cent, and at Boston 92 per cent, and no objection or appeal from the decision of the appraisers was made on the part of the importers.

I would respectfully and earnestly urge upon Congress to inquire fully into the practical operation of our present system of imposing duties upon the foreign cost or values of merchandise, being fully satisfied that the longer it is continued the weaker will become the restraints upon, and the stronger the inducements to, the commission of frauds by misrepresenting the dutiable values.

AD VALOREM OBJECTIONS MANY.

And, again, under the heading of "Ways and means," he says:

The system of ad valorem duties, however well adapted to many articles of trade, when applied to all without discrimination, restriction, or safeguard, has been proved by the experience of this department to be the subject of many and long objections. Its tendency is to cherish a spirit of overtrading greatly injurious to the industry of our country in all its departments, and, in its final results, fatal to the revenue. Considering this system only in its operation upon revenue, it is believed that the experience of the most enlightened commercial nations of Europe has proved it to be impolitic and unsafe. Under the operation of the British tariff, revised in 1846, the whole revenue derived from articles paying ad valorem duties has been only an average of £38,000 ($182,000) per annum in a gross receipt from customs of £22,000,000 ($105,000,000), being less than one-fifth of 1 per cent of this immense income from imposts; and the evident design of Parliament was to make specific duties the source of revenue from imports, so far as possibly could be effected. A like policy has also always been pursued by the other commercial nations of Europe.

The primary object to be kept in view in levying duties upon imports is admitted to be revenue. It is equally well established as the policy and duty of the Government so to discriminate in the levying of duties as, without falling below the necessary amount of revenue, to give the greatest encouragement possible to all the industrial pursuits of our own people. One feature of the law of 1846, in the opinion of the department, is opposed to both the controlling principles just stated. I have reference to an equal or higher rate of duty on the raw material than upon the manufactured article of which it is composed. Such provisions certainly take from the manufacturer and artisan that encouragement which the present law doubtless to some extent was intended to afford and also check the importation of the raw material to a degree detrimental to the revenue.

The constant fluctuations in prices, and consequently in the duties, under an unrestricted ad valorem tariff give to the act of 1846 that most objectionable feature, instability. These variations, giving a high duty when least required and low duties when prices are ruinous, tend to an excess of importations, and subject all the products of labor in our own country to the frequent and enormous fluctuations in the markets abroad, arising from the disturbed condition of those nations with whom our foreign commerce is chiefly carried on. Under the present system duties are highest when the article imported is highest and when the purchaser and consumer can least afford to pay the duty, and lowest when the price of the article wanted would allow a heavy additional duty to be levied on it. Thus, if an article costs $10, a duty of 30 per cent would compel an addition of $3; if that article falls in value to $5, then is the duty reduced one-half.

That can not be a wholesome system of taxation which follows the consumer in his purchases, increasing his burden when prices are high, and taking it off as prices fall and his ability to bear it increases. If applied to articles of subsistence, it would operate as a heavy tax upon bread in a year of famine, increasing with the intensity of the evil and gradually disappearing with the return of abundance.

The objection to the present tariff system from commercial fluctuations in the prices is constantly forced upon the attention of the department by instances of extreme inequality and prejudicial operation.

CORWIN'S SUGGESTED CHANGES.

Further on, under the same heading:

From the foregoing considerations the department would submit the following modifications of our present revenue laws:

"1. A change in the present ad valorem system, which should impose specific duties upon all articles to which such duties may be safely applied, with home valuations upon all such as are necessarily subject to ad valorem rates.

"2. If the principle of specific duties shall not be adopted, that the home valuation instead of the foreign should then be applied to all imports subject to ad valorem duties.

"3. If neither of the foregoing changes shall be thought proper, then it is deemed highly necessary that the present rates of duties should be increased on a great variety of articles which it will be found could bear such an increase with the most salutary effects upon both trade and revenue."

Either of the two first modifications suggested above would undoubtedly correct many of the inequalities of the present system; place all importers, whether importers or manufacturers, on equal grounds in respect to valuations for duty; guard the revenue against the flagrant frauds which are so easily perpetrated under existing laws, and insure stability and permanent increase of the revenue. They are therefore earnestly commended to the favorable consideration of Congress.

FILLMORE POINTS OUT DEFECTS.

Millard Fillmore, who was then President, went into this subject at some length in his first message to the Thirty-second Congress; and in his succeeding message, after having observed the workings of the ad valorem Walker tariff system for another year, says:

In my first message to Congress I called attention to what seemed to me some defects in the present tariff and recommended such modifications as in my judgment were best adapted to remedy the evils and promote the prosperity of the country. Nothing has since occurred to change my views on this important question. Without repeating the argument contained in my former message in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is the effect of large importations of foreign goods on our currency. Most of the gold of California as fast as it is coined finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost. Thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer is to that extent deprived of a home market for the sale of his products. In the third place, the destruction of manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our markets, and the consequent rise in articles sent here for sale is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England.

PRESIDENT BUCHANAN ASSAILS AD VALOREM.

President Buchanan, in his second annual message to the Thirty-fifth Congress, has this to say regarding specific and ad valorem duties:

In regard to the mode of assessing and collecting duties under a strictly revenue tariff, I have long entertained and often expressed the opinion that sound policy requires this should be done by specific duties in cases to which these can be properly applied. They are well adapted to commodities which are usually sold by weight or by measure and which by their nature are of equal or of nearly equal value. Such, for example, are the articles of iron of different classes, raw sugar, and foreign wines and spirits.

In my deliberate judgment specific duties are the best, if not the only, means of securing the revenue against the false and fraudulent invoices, and such has been the practice adopted for this purpose by other commercial nations. Besides, specific duties would afford to the American manufacturer the incidental advantages to which he is fairly entitled under a revenue tariff. The present system is a sliding scale to his disadvantage. Under it, when prices are high and business prosperous, the duties rise in amount when he least requires their aid. On the contrary, when prices fall and he is struggling against adversity, the duties are diminished in the same proportion greatly to his injury.

Neither would there be danger that a higher rate of duty than that intended by Congress could be levied in the form of specific duties. It would be easy to ascertain the average value of any imported article for a series of years, and instead of subjecting it to an ad valorem duty at a certain rate per centum to substitute in its place an equivalent specific duty.

By such an arrangement the consumer would not be injured. It is true he might have to pay a little more duty on a given article in one year; but, if so, he would pay a little less in another, and in a series of years these would counterbalance each other and amount to the same thing so far as his interest is concerned. This inconvenience would be trifling when contrasted with the additional security thus afforded against frauds upon the revenue, in which every consumer is directly interested.

I have thrown out these suggestions as the fruit of my own observation, to which Congress, in their better judgment, will give such weight as they may justly deserve.

PEOPLE POOR IN MIDST OF PLENTY.

In his first annual message to the Thirty-fifth Congress, first session, President Buchanan had this to say of the condition of the country, the finances, and the distress of the people:

We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.

Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people. With this the Government can not fail deeply to sympathize, though it may be without the power to extend relief.

Now, mark you, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] said that all manufacturing interests and all of our people were prosperous under the Walker tariff. In the report of 1851, only four years after that law went into effect, Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, said, concerning the condition of the steel and iron industry:

From the evidence furnished to this department it is clear that the rolling mills, the charcoal furnaces, and the forges are utterly unable to produce iron at the prices at which it is now imported. During the last year many establishments were enabled to survive only by carrying the iron to the high stages of manufacture, as the making of nails and forged work. At the present time the prices are below the cost of production. If the present policy continues, we must witness in a short time the total prostration of this industry, which, once destroyed, will require many years to replace it upon its present footing as to skill and experience; and we shall become dependent upon foreign countries for the most important material in the arts of peace and most indispensable of the muniments of war.

And again:

Thus we perceive that the actual consumption of iron, which, under high duties and prices, was steadily augmenting in quantity, is, under the present reduced rates, both in duties and prices, gradually falling off, notwithstanding the increase of population and the great extension of our farming interests.

I present with this report several tables intended to show the sudden and extraordinary fall in the invoice values of certain articles which prior to the tariff act of 1846 had been subject to specific duties, but which, by that law, were made subject to duties ad valorem. It must be apparent from these tables that great frauds are practiced by undervaluations daily, which no expedient can prevent, unless such articles as set forth in these tables are charged with specific instead of ad valorem duties.

Friends of the ad valorem tariff argue that modern scientific methods of inspection have virtually eliminated fraudulent undervaluations, so common in earlier days, but against this argument are constant disclosures of frauds made by secret-service agents of the Treasury Department. Some of these discoveries, running into millions of dollars, are recent and will continue to come to light as long as the ad valorem system of levying tariff is practiced. The fact that it is necessary to maintain a large staff of secret agents to carry on a constant espionage of our customhouses and even to go to the very point of origin of our importations, I think, partially, if not conclusively, sustains my position.

COUNTRY UNSETTLED BY TARIFF AGITATION.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this decade so forcefully referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], during which time the wealth of the country increased 126 per cent, when California was pouring out its millions of gold, when from every reasonable viewpoint both the Government and the people at large should have been prosperous, the country really for most of that time was in a state of unrest on account of tariff agitation commenced as soon as Franklin Pierce was inaugurated in March, 1853, and James Guthrie was appointed Secretary of the Treasury.

Notwithstanding that the Whig administration of Fillmore had operated altogether under the Democratic Walker tariff, the Treasury, under the administration of that wise statesman Thomas Corwin, had been enabled to meet Government expenses and pay interest on the public debt, including the money borrowed during the Polk administration and the life of the Walker tariff, aggregating $47,014,299, and in spite of the fact that Corwin had pointed out that it would only be a matter of time until the Walker tariff would be inadequate and the loss of tariff under ad valorem duties, owing to the perpetration of frauds, would increase, and advised Congress to change the method.

Notwithstanding this statement of his eminent predecessor, Mr. Guthrie and the Democratic Congress immediately commenced to tinker with the tariff—their own tariff—and not only reduced duties by an average of 20 per cent, but left the same old process of ad valorem duties.

The country, through uncertainty during the period from 1853 to 1857, gradually lost confidence, culminating in the panic of 1857.

FAILED TO PROFIT BY EXPERIENCE.

Now, Mr. Chairman, did the Democratic Party see the light or profit to any extent by that experience?

No. While their Secretary of the Treasury, Howell Cobb, advised a change in tariff rates, they were to be levied in the same old way and with that misconception a tariff for revenue only; and he himself, in arguing against the ideas of Corwin, admits the fallacy of calling any of the so-called tariff for revenue measures of his party by that name. In his report, December 6, 1858, he says:

I do not deem it proper to enter into any extended discussion of the theoretic principles on which a tariff act should be framed.

They may be briefly stated. Such duties should be laid as will produce the required revenue, by imposing on the people at large the smallest and most equal burdens.

It is obvious that this is most effectually done by taxing, in preference to others, such articles as are not produced in this country, and, among articles produced here, those in which the home product bears the least proportion to the quantity imported are the fittest for taxation. The reason is that in taxing articles not made in the country the whole sum taken from the consumer goes into the Treasury, while in the other class the consumer pays the enhanced value not only on the quantity imported but on the quantity made at home. This last tax is paid not to the Treasury but to the manufacturer, thereby rendering such a duty not only burdensome but grossly unequal, the home producer being benefited at the expense of the consumer.

If these principles are sound, it is obvious that no tariff strictly for revenue has ever yet been enacted in the United States.

He then properly proceeds to give his ideas of the raising of revenues under the then existing crisis, and advises that after ascertaining the additional revenue required, that the increase of duties should only be such as to raise that amount, which is good doctrine; but, mind you, this change was recommended within a year and a half of the enactment of the latest Democratic tariff law which, in its inception and promulgation had paralyzed the country, culminating in the panic of 1857.

TARIFF CHANGE PARALYZES COUNTRY.

This law, within the short period of a year and a half, had been found totally inadequate to keep up the expenses of the Government, and the country and the business world were again subjected to a threatened change of tariff that kept business paralyzed during the entire period of Buchanan's unfortunate administration.

I think if gentlemen will read the reports of Secretaries of the Treasury, mostly their own officials, during the period referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], they will find that from the years 1850 to 1860 the Government was in about as bad condition, with the exception of two or three years, as it ever has been in its entire history.

But, more than that, the rates of duty collected all that time were ad valorem, and all of them had to admit that there was gross undervaluation. Still, in the face of all that, you gentlemen are now bringing in here a tariff measure calling for ad valorem duties, and you point, forsooth, to the inequalities in the Payne law. I would not for a minute try to say that the schedules under the Payne law are correct. I think, as well as you do, that they have made mistakes there. They have the cheaper articles bearing the highest rate of duty; but that is no argument against specific duties. That is because they were levied wrong to start with.

They have also levied ad valorem and specific duties on the same articles, making combination rates, thereby giving chance for fraud and undervaluation by the ad valorem feature, that is to the disadvantage of the honest importer. It has the same defects in that respect that the Walker bill had, and the duties are not levied equitably, which is not right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will go back to my manuscript, and try not to digress, and perhaps I will get through in that time.

Mr. Chairman, with the coming of 1861 the Democratic Party retired from power, and was practically out until the inauguration of Grover Cleveland, March 4, 1885, or a period of 24 years.

DISASTROUS POLICIES REVIVED.

Immediately thereafter we began to see the old policies that had proved disastrous to the country in the days before the Civil War promulgated and advised, ignoring all the ills that were incident to the previous trials. Unfortunately for the Democrats in the fifties, they did not have anywhere to place the blame. The Republican Party had not been born, and during the decade from 1850 to 1860 they had controlled it all except the period of the Taylor-Filmore administration, from March 4, 1849, to March 4, 1853, and the revenue measure of that period was a Democratic one. They had a legitimate right to learn from those experiences, but they did not, and in all the tariff measures as yet advocated by that party, the same misfortunes have befallen the people to a larger or smaller degree, dependent upon the relative approach to a free-trade basis.

And each of these disastrous changes has been accompanied by the cry "Republican misrule, extravagance, and the robber tariff." Yet, strange to relate, the result of Democratic legislation has always been the same as during their administrations in the fifties when they had no Republican Party to blame.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of past experiences, or experiments, I might say, and despite the fact that such authorities as Howell Cobb, and he was a Democrat, have pointed out the proper way to frame, and the true philosophy of, a tariff for revenue only, the majority has brought in this bill for revising Schedule K under the guise of a tariff-for-revenue-only measure. And they promise the country that they are going to take up the tariff, schedule by schedule, and gradually work it down to a tariff-for-revenue-only basis.

As a protective measure I can easily see the necessity for revision in that manner, but by what philosophy or judgment we can start in to convert protective schedules into a tariff-for-revenue measure I can not comprehend.

Our friends' theory of a tariff for revenue only and their deploring the necessity for raising revenue that way is hardly compatible with the protective features of this bill, even though from a Republican viewpoint it is too low.

SHOULD FIRST DETERMINE THE AMOUNT NEEDED.

It looks like the gentlemen on the other side of the House would first ascertain the amount of money necessary to run the Government and then put reasonable tariff for revenue on all noncompetitive articles coming into the country. If such revenue was not sufficient, then place a reasonable revenue on that class of articles competitive in the least degree, and that failing of a sufficient amount supplemented by a tariff on luxuries, increase the internal revenue on liquors and tobaccos.

They would in that way consistently carry out, in part, Democratic ideas and effect these reforms, but schedule by schedule simply to reach a revenue basis will cause revision and rerevision and keep the country unsettled for years.

COUNTRY ALREADY FEELING UNCERTAINTY.

But history will repeat itself. The country already is feeling the effects of the uncertainty. They are riding into power on a popular wave of disfavor of the people at the action of the last Republican Congress on tariff revision. And I will say right here, I agree with the people. I think they had a perfect right to expect a proper revision, not only in Schedule K, but in several other schedules affecting different commodities. Their not securing this was no doubt largely responsible for the Democratic success at the last election.

The Democrats were given a great opportunity, and by showing a true desire to benefit the people and reasonable attention to the advanced ideas of the times, among Democrats as well as Republicans, they might so have impressed the people that they would have given them the reins of government, and if so, they might have held them for more than two or four years.

AMERICAN IDEA OPPOSED TO CAUCUS.

The first mistake was the caucus. The American idea now is to repudiate and condemn the caucus. Previous action of Republicans in legislating in caucus had as much to do with Democratic success as did the sentiment that the platform promises had been ignored.

But no Republican caucus ever held more complete control over its members, I want to say to the gentlemen on that side of the House, than has your party caucus over yours during the present Congress. It certainly has not strengthened you before the people, and I feel confident you will discover a contrary effect. Your party has controlled, in addition to the South, the most of the large cities of the country the last 20 years, and Republican success has depended on the vote of the agricultural population and the towns and villages of the country.

I suppose you congratulated yourself when you decided in caucus to support the President's reciprocity measure, confident in your own minds that it would lose him the votes of some protection Republicans, and that you could consistently claim it to be a Democratic measure, as your party had in 1854 placed on the statute books a very similar reciprocity measure, that proved to be only reciprocity in name and lost the Government of the United States millions of dollars in revenue, just as it is conceded the present treaty will do.

This latest reciprocity agreement put all the agricultural products of the North on the free list in their unmanufactured state. As a compensating measure you brought forth what you were pleased to call the farmers' free-list bill. And it was a free-list bill, for under it you actually put on the free list all the manufactured or finished product of the northern farmers, giving his product thus free trade with all the world, and in return for this you gave him free agricultural implements.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. May I ask the gentlemen a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If you think that the taking off of the tariff on farm implements will not cause them to sell at a less price in this country, why is it that they sell American manufactured farm implements at a less price in foreign countries than they do in this country?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With the exception of isolated cases, cases where men want to introduce goods, or where they have an oversupply on hand and want to get rid of them, that is not the case, and the history of American commerce all over the world will show it. It is the exception and not the rule.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Then you deny it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have heard that same old thing claimed for 10 years.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. You dispute it, do you? Do you say it is not a fact?

DISPUTES SELLING CHEAPER ABROAD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I say it is not a fact except in isolated cases; in certain cases the cheaper price is justifiable and is not caused by discrimination. In a minute I will illustrate. I am a member of the Grange and the Farmers' Union, and I have heard this thing talked of for years. I voted for the free-list bill.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Why did you vote for it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I received petitions by the thousands from farmers on the reciprocity measure, and they all mentioned that agricultural machinery was one of the things that was taxed, and that was one of the arguments against putting their products on the free list. I did not think personally it would make any difference, but I was not going to put forward my own opinion.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. You wanted to give them a sop.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I did not want to give them a sop; but I wanted to be fair to my constituents.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. How much does the gentleman say we will lose in revenue by the farmers' free-list bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not stated; I have not even mentioned it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Some gentleman on that side did, and I think he said it was $10,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not mention it. I am not going to dispute that point with the gentleman.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Does the gentleman think it would amount to that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not within my knowledge, and I am not going to give the gentleman an answer to anything that I have not investigated. It might be that much, but only a small part of it would come from agricultural machinery.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is it not much easier for the gentleman to find out how much revenue comes into the country from that schedule than it is to know that they do not sell farming implements cheaper in foreign countries than they do in this?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to say to the gentleman that with the exception of a few articles there is very little agricultural machinery manufactured abroad that United States farmers would use in any event. It is not suitable to our country. They do not make our class of machinery.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. How does the gentleman account for the statement that there is $10,000,000 of revenue from it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have already answered that, but if you will give me a chance I will tell you something about this charge of selling machinery abroad cheaper than in this country. I live 3,000 miles from here by the railroad. We will say down here in Pennsylvania there is a manufacturer of agricultural machinery. There is a carload of that machinery wanted in Liverpool and another carload wanted at Spokane, in my State. The manufacturer will bill out two cars at the same price at the factory. The freight rate to New York is very low, and from that point to Liverpool freight is low. Consequently the man in Liverpool will get those goods a great deal cheaper than the man in Spokane can possibly get them on account of the freight rate.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman state——

FREIGHT RATES MAKE DIFFERENCE IN PRICE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish the gentleman would give me time to answer a question that he has already asked me before he asks another. He asked me why agricultural machinery was sold abroad cheaper than in this country and I am trying to tell him. If the dealer in Spokane has had to pay a freight rate of $2.60 or even $1.50 a hundred pounds for his car of goods, and the man in Liverpool has only had to pay a freight rate of 75 cents or $1, it is easy to see that the man in Liverpool can sell the machinery cheaper than the dealer in Spokane.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. But suppose as a matter of fact one man lived on the southern side of the Rio Grande and another on the Texas side, right across the river; and one man can get a John Deere plow for $8 and the other man on the other side pays $4.50. The man on the American side has to pay $8.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That case may have happened; I do not know anything about it, but I very much doubt it. I have heard it said on the floor of this House, and I have heard it stated in other places, that the same condition prevailed in Canada; that you could buy American binders cheaper on that side than you could on this side. I want to say that that is false; that there never has been such a case. If there was, it has been an isolated case. The truth is the Canadian farmer has to pay a higher price. You can substantiate my assertion by asking the gentlemen from those States contiguous to Canada who are Members of this body.

AMERICAN IMPLEMENTS EXCEL.

There is a Canadian-made binder that is sold cheaper than the American-made binders, but in agricultural as well as all other kinds of machinery the United States product excels, and the Canadians prefer our binders.

Canada has a provision whereby second-hand machinery from the United States can go into Canada free of duty, if it is being brought in from this country to be used on that side. Many a Canadian farmer along the border comes over on the American side and buys his binder, where he is close enough to make it profitable, buys it for ten or fifteen dollars or whatever the price is cheaper—and it is cheaper every time—and he goes out and works in some American farmer's field long enough to dirty up the binder a little so as to show it has been used, and then he takes it across the border, and in that way hundreds of binders go into Canada, and thus is evaded the payment of the tariff.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; just give me a minute, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he can give me a little more time?

Mr. MANN. The time is all pledged. If the gentleman himself would use a little more time on the subject, I will be glad to yield it to him, but the time is all pledged.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would like to have the gentleman given a little more time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman when I have time and give all the information possible, and am sorry I can not yield further.

DECLARES COMMITTEE IS INSINCERE.

Mr. Chairman, I can not believe the gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee who are responsible for this free-list bill seriously believe that a tariff, high or low, or absolute free trade, will affect the price of agricultural machinery in this country to any great extent?

No manufacturing country in the world uses or makes the grades or kinds of machinery used in this country, neither is any country going to invest its money in plants or factories to manufacture our class or kind of machinery on account of this free-trade provison when it is known that a succeeding Congress can as easily restore duties. So I say again, the hope of reduced prices on agricultural machinery on account of its being placed on the free list is remote indeed.

There was no protest against this measure from any agricultural machinery manufacturer. The International Harvester Co. never came before your Ways and Means Committee protesting against this placing its product on the free list. No; it was a matter of indifference to all such manufacturers.

I have referred at some length to the agricultural machinery feature of the farmers' free-list bill for the reason that gentlemen on that side of the Chamber have delighted to call attention to the concession of free agricultural implements to the farmer. I want to say to them that in my judgment they were giving him a stone instead of bread when they gave him free agricultural machinery.

Free sugar would have conferred a much greater benefit and would have benefited all classes.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers' free-list bill, which has been referred to, and which places agricultural machinery on the free list, which in my judgment will not lower the price, also put jute and all jute products on the free list. In my own section of the country all of our grains are sacked in jute bags for shipment. In fact, that is the custom in all the Pacific Coast States. They are used by millions, and the actual saving to the farmers of the Pacific coast in any year would amount to much more than the combined value of all the jute bag manufactories of the Rocky Mountains, I presume.

The farmers of my own district use an average of 15,000,000 bags the year. I was not giving them any sop when I voted for the free-list bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL], because of my statement that I voted for the bill, even though I expected no relief from the placing of agricultural machinery on the free list.

There were several other reasons why I supported the measure. All the people of my district wear shoes, and our farmers and teamsters use harness. The farmer's end of the leather business already had been placed on the free list by a Republican Congress. Free hides already had been conceded to the manufacturers of leather products by a Republican Congress.

Why not? It was only the farmer and stock raiser affected, and they are a patient, long-suffering class. They were not consulted when hides were placed on the free list any more than they were in regard to the so-called Canadian reciprocity bill, and when they kicked, were told it was—like a dose of castor oil—good for them.

A majority of the Members from the great manufacturing States voted for free hides when they went on the free list, just as they did for Jim Hill's reciprocity fraud.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in the Republican principle of protection, but the Members who voted for free hides in the Sixty-first Congress and those voting for the reciprocity sham at this session have no license to poke principle at the northwestern Members, for they themselves have worn that principle threadbare.

My own constituents are so geographically situated as to minimize the losses that might arise from manufactured agricultural products coming in free, likewise Argentina's and other meat supplies. Under the free-list bill, the eastern, northern, and middle west farmers will have to combat that feature to a much greater extent than the Pacific northwest farmer. Free shoes, free leather products, free jute grain bags, free flour, and cereal foodstuffs will come nearer compensating in my district and State for the evils of the measure than in any other part of the United States, in my opinion.

I told the gentleman from Texas that I voted for the free-list bill, and I will tell him now I expect to vote for this bill. I believe in a revision of Schedule K. I believe your revision is too low and is going to an opposite extreme, especially as applied to the raw product.

PRESENT BILL LOWER THAN WALKER TARIFF.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] spoke of the beneficent effect of the Walker tariff, and while I differ from him as to its wonderful efficiency, and think I am justifiable in my position in view of the Treasury reports of its day, still I am willing to concede it to have been the best Democratic tariff law ever enacted. Yet, under it raw wool received 50 per cent more protection than it does under this bill. It had 30 per cent against 20 per cent in this bill. I expect this bill to pass, go to the Senate, and there be revised and sent back to the House.

I think the happy medium will be found, and eventually, I hope, we will pass the bill in a form as nearly equal and just as a tariff bill can be made. I would prefer that this bill were referred back to the committee and there held until after the report of the Tariff Board, so that more accurate information could be had, and then be brought out again at the regular session. But I realize that you Democrats are going to pass this bill, and I am not one to go on record against a revision.

The passage of this bill now and sending it over to the Senate may hasten proper revision of this schedule.

Mr. Chairman, I consider the ad valorem feature of this bill its greatest weakness. It was the weakness of the Walker tariff, as shown by Secretary Corwin's reports, heretofore mentioned, and of the law of 1857 that superseded it, which was also a Democratic tariff measure. President Buchanan forcefully referred to this weakness as did President Fillmore.

I think their logic sound and irrefutable. They were not theorizing, but were dealing with actual conditions as then existing. Happy is the country whose statesmen and lawmakers are wise enough to shun and avoid past mistakes and profit by past experiences.

FARMERS' LAST PROP REMOVED.

Mr. Chairman, in the reciprocity bill and farmers' free-list bill all the products of the northern farmer were placed on the free list except wool, and now, under this bill, you practically put wool on the free list. So the northern farmer is now, you might say, to all practical purposes, deprived of all protection in the way of a tariff on any and all of his commodities, if this measure becomes a law.

While some of us on this side of the Chamber have or will vote for some or all of these measures, the fact will remain that none of them could or would pass without your permission and support. If a period of depression follows this action, the blame will finally be placed where it belongs. The Republican Party first suffers for its sins of commission and omission, but your party will in the long run get what is coming to it.

Already a depression is stealing over this country, and it will gradually culminate in a deluge. By that time the people of the country will be ready for fair protection, and not free trade or tariff for revenue.

The duties you are levying under this schedule for revenue purposes are based on an estimate of increased importations from abroad, but under an ad valorem duty which, as I have read from the experiences of Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury 1850 to 1853, is likely to fall short of its just amount on account of undervaluations—which an ad valorem duty openly invites—and will either be inadequate to meet the estimate or, if it does, will flood the country with undervalued foreign goods. This would work hardship and disaster to American manufacturers and labor, just as did the importations of iron and steel under the Walker ad valorem measure, as set forth by Secretary Corwin in his report to the Thirty-second Congress, January 27, 1853, already referred to.

Mr. Chairman, for several years now the country has been greatly agitated over the high cost of living, and various economists, as well as the Government, have been making an investigation of the causes.

HIGH LIVING MAKES COST HIGHER.

A committee was once appointed by the United States Senate to take testimony and report back to the Senate on the high cost of living. The students of Washington State College, located in my home town, presented a burlesque performance in which the Senate committee took evidence on not the high cost of living but on the cost of high living, and they were able to offer a great amount of amusing entertainment; but the thoughtful man could get much more than humor out of it.

And the question naturally arose as to whether or not a great part of the cry of high cost of living was not really a desire for high living at a low price.

I have been considerably impressed during this debate by the oft-repeated statement by gentlemen on that side of the Chamber that under the present tariff law the duty on a suit of woolen clothing is approximately $9.40, and they said it just as though they believed and wanted the country to believe that the American consumer was paying that amount of added price to the American manufacturer or retailer on account of the tariff.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that when some of the gentlemen on that side of the House, and especially those who, like myself, are new Members, got ready to start to Washington they felt that they should be well dressed, knowing that these plutocratic Members we had heard about so long would be well dressed. So when they went to their tailor and picked out the best, and gave orders for best finish and trimmings, and the price was from $40 to $60 the suit, they felt when they paid the bill that there was $9.40 too much somewhere. It therefore comes easy to them to infer that $9.40 is actually collected because of the tariff on each woolen suit.

FACTS DO NOT BEAR OUT FIGURES.

Mr. Chairman, since hearing these figures given as the tariff on a suit of clothing I have made it a point to look up the price of custom-made woolen and worsted clothing, and I find that you can buy guaranteed all-wool—both warp and filling—suits for as low as $10 the suit, and the prices range all the way from $10 to $30 for custom-made clothing and from $15 to $60 for all-wool merchant-tailored clothing in Washington. Now, it does not need any great amount of reasoning on the part of any man of ordinary intelligence to make him conclude that even though the tariff rate should figure out as our friends claim, $9.40 on a suit, that the American consumer is not paying that, or any considerable part of that amount, when he purchases a suit of clothes.

For my part I have preferred to pay the higher price, believing that I was fully compensated for the greater cost by the vast difference in workmanship. In other words, my tailors out in Spokane charged me a fair price, which was above the lower figures I have named, and put the difference in cost into the clothes.

Mr. Chairman, the same can be said of most all classes of fabrics and goods offered for consumption and use in the United States. There are many different grades and prices, and our people can live reasonably cheap or as high as they care to go, and while tariff changes might affect the prices, and I think it will some, especially under a free-trade or tariff-for-revenue system, I fear that our people would not be able to purchase them at the lowered prices for lack of employment and money.

What this country wants is fair tariff legislation, protecting our manufacturers and labor from foreign competition, with uniform, well-established duties, regulations of trusts and combines to insure fair competition, and a restoration of confidence among our people; then all branches of business will have an equal opportunity under the law and all of our people have a chance to prosper as no other country ever has prospered. All of our labor employed at a fair wage, and the product of the shop, field, and factory bringing a fair price, would insure that welfare and prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD]. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to avail myself of this opportunity of submitting a few observations concerning the pending bill, to discuss briefly the tariff question in general, and incidentally to consider the trust question in its relation to the tariff in effecting high prices and the cost of living in this country.

At the outset of my remarks I desire to submit this thought for the deliberation of every Member of this House. If you impose no tariff or duty upon a particular commodity, of course you will derive no revenue therefrom. If you impose a prohibitive rate of duty thereon, you produce precisely the same result—no revenue. In other words, absolute free trade and absolute protection in so far as revenues are concerned produce a like result—no revenue whatsoever. If free trade is to be condemned because it would destroy our revenues, protection should be condemned for the same reason. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me pursue this thought a little further. If you impose a very low rate of duty upon an article, some revenue will be derived therefrom, but the amount will be small on account of the low rate. If you impose a very high rate thereon, but one that is not prohibitive, some revenue will be derived therefrom, but the amount will be small on account of the limited importation. If you take a very high rate and proceed to lower it gradually, and a very low rate and proceed to raise it in like manner, you will come to a common rate that will produce the greatest amount of revenue. This is known as the maximum revenue-producing rate. This is true of every commodity and every item in all the various tariff schedules. Of course it will differ with the nature and character of the article and the demand therefor.

Now, the maximum revenue-producing rate is common ground between the protectionist and those who stand for a tariff for revenue. Here the two systems meet, part company, and proceed in opposite directions. We might illustrate that in a very simple way. Suppose two men meet at a common point upon one of our public highways and then turn their backs on each other and go in opposite directions. Every step they take they get farther and farther apart. Let us carry the illustration a little further. Let us suppose that one of these men is a tax-gatherer and the other is a shrewd confidence man. The tax-gatherer goes his way from house to house and place to place collecting taxes due from the people to the State or the municipality or the county, and turns the money so collected into the public treasury. He represents the tariff-for-revenue man. The confidence man, sleek, well dressed, glib of tongue, goes his way from house to house and place to place until he has covered the entire territory visited by the tax collector, and under the specious and false pretense of collecting money for the poor or for some public charity induces every man he meets to voluntarily turn over to him the exact amount or almost the exact amount of money that he had paid for taxes, and after he has collected in this way large and princely sums of money puts it down in his pocket and retires to some gilded castle or some marble palace and lives in ease and affluence the rest of his days. I am not going to say that he represents the protectionist, but he represents the beneficiary of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.] By this simple illustration you have in concrete form the whole tariff issue between Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. Chairman, the power to impose tariffs on articles imported into this country rests entirely upon Article I, section 8, of the Federal Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The mere reading of this provision discloses the fact that the framers of the Constitution looked upon all tariffs, including duties, imposts, and excises, as taxes which might be properly levied to pay debts, to provide for the common defense, and to promote the general welfare. That they were regarded not as benefits, not as privileges, but as burdens is evidenced by the fact that it is specifically provided that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. By this provision of the fundamental law the taxing power is expressly conferred upon Congress for the specific purpose of raising revenue. We fail to find in this provision of the Constitution any hint or suggestion that this power is conferred upon Congress to enable it to levy duties and imposts in order to protect our manufacturers or to guarantee to them reasonable profits or to protect labor or to benefit farmers. The idea that they intended to vest in Congress the power to confer special privileges upon manufacturers as a class, upon laborers as a class, or upon farmers as a class is foreign to the language of the instrument and is precluded by the declaration that all such duties must be uniform throughout the United States. The purpose, and sole purpose, of this provision of the Constitution is to confer upon Congress the taxing power, the power to provide for the revenues necessary to maintain the Government, to pay its debts, to provide for its common defense, and promote its general welfare. Thus it will be observed that the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue finds its justification in the language of the Constitution itself. The Republican doctrine of protection for the benefit of American manufacturers or American labor or the American farmer is unwarranted under any fair interpretation of the language used in the Constitution. I insist that as a matter of fact our protective-tariff system is maintained solely for the benefit of our manufacturing classes and that the specious claim made by the Republicans "that it is for the protection of laborers, workingmen, or farmers" is a sham, a pretense, and a fraud. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It can have no effect upon the price of labor, except as to the few who are employed in the factories, and these constitute only a small number in comparison with the laborers employed throughout the country outside of the factories. It can confer no benefit upon farmers, except in a local way, for the general products of the farm throughout the United States are exported and sold in the open markets of the world.

The only justification, therefore, for the imposition of any kind of tariff, tax, or duty in this country is found in the fact that the imposition of such duties, imposts, and excises are necessary in order to raise revenues for the maintenance of the Federal Government and for the administration of its laws. Good administration requires that even upon this power there should be a just limitation, and that no more revenues should be raised than are necessary to carry on the Government economically administered. Is it possible for our Republican friends to read into the Constitution any authority for the doctrine of protection for home industries, laborers, or farmers? Is it possible for them by any process of sound reasoning to read into the Constitution any authority for Congress to delegate the taxing power to individuals and corporations, and thus enable them to enjoy special privileges by fixing a higher price upon their own products equal to the tax imposed by the Government upon similar commodities imported from foreign countries? The doctrine of protection stands for the principle of conferring special privileges upon certain favored classes of our citizens, to the exclusion of and at the expense of all others.

To my mind the doctrine of protection is equally unjustifiable, whether the favored class be manufacturers, laborers, or farmers. It is a special privilege to whoever receives the benefit; and the extra profit, the extra wage or the extra price is borne by the entire body of our citizenship not belonging to the favored classes. The principle of protection is without constitutional warrant; it was conceived in fraud, is born of greed, and has been maintained by fallacy for more than 40 years by the Republican Party. Destroy the principle of protection and you destroy the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, as a Democrat who is utterly opposed to the principle of protection and who is in full accord with the time-honored tenets of his party relative to the imposition of imposts or tariff duties, I desire to ask what is there in this proposed act, or bill, that violates any fundamental principle of our party or to prevent me or any other Democrat who believes in a tariff for revenue, or any free-trade Democrat, from voting for it in preference to the existing law?

I can readily understand why a Republican protectionist, or a protectionist Democrat, or a Democrat whose constituents have strong protective proclivities, might hesitate to vote for and might oppose this bill, but I can not understand how even a Republican who believes that our present tariff rates are responsible for the high cost of living, or who believes that our present rates of duty on wool and woolen goods are excessively high and ought to be lowered, or a Democrat who is opposed altogether to the principle of protection, or a Democrat who is a free trader should oppose or hesitate one moment to give his support to this measure. I desire at this point, without going into details as to the several items in the bill, to call attention to and insert as a part of my remarks the summary of statistics furnished by the experts employed by the Ways and Means Committee and printed on page 73 of the report accompanying the bill, as follows:

Summary of statistics presented.

Items.	Present act—Results for year ending June 30, 1910.	Proposed act—Estimated results for a 12-month period.
Raw wool:
Imports	$47,687,293.20	$66,991,000.00
Duties	$21,128,728.74	$13,398,200.00
Average unit of value, per pound	$0.186
Equivalent ad valorem rate, per cent	44.31	20.00
Manufactures of wool:
Imports	$23,057,958.78	$63,831,000.00
Duties	$20,776,121.26	$27,157,800.00
Equivalent ad valorem rate, per cent	90.10	42.55
Total revenue	$41,904,850.00	$40,556,000.00

Average ad valorem rate on manufactures of wool under Wilson law (1896), 87.84.

From this table it will be observed that in our present tariff act, commonly known as the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, the equivalent ad valorem rate of duty on raw wool is 44.31 per cent. Under the proposed act or bill now under consideration, the ad valorem duty on raw wool is 20 per cent, or a reduction of more than 50 per cent from the present rate of duty. Under the existing law the equivalent ad valorem duty on manufactured woolen goods is 90.10 per cent, and under this proposed act or bill the ad valorem duties are 42.55 per cent, or a reduction of more than 50 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, we have in this country three distinct theories or schools of thought in regard to tariff legislation. First, the advocates of high-protective tariff rates—those who stand for protection for protection sake and who favor the imposition of prohibitive duties in order to protect home industries from foreign competition. This is the Republican position. Second, the advocates of a tariff for purposes of revenue. This is the Democratic position. Third, the advocates of free trade, who oppose the imposition of any and all tariff duties and favor free and open markets with all the countries of the world.

While these three propositions theoretically and fundamentally differ widely, in their practical application in making tariff laws there is such a blending and confusion of all three of these principles, that it is exceedingly difficult to construct a tariff bill that will be satisfactory to the extreme advocates of either theory. As Mr. Cleveland once aptly said: "It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us"—when we undertake to revise our manifold and complex tariff schedules.

But if you will compare this bill with the three fundamental propositions referred to, I believe you will agree with me, that this is in strict conformity with the Democratic position for a tariff for revenue only.

Mr. Chairman, it is evident that this is not a free-trade bill, for it imposes duties upon both the raw material and the finished product. It is equally clear that it is not a protectionist's bill, for the present law, while highly protective, is not prohibitive, for it brings in $21,000,000 per annum on raw wool and about $20,000,000 per annum on manufactures of wool. This bill is less prohibitive than the present law, for, as already stated, it reduces the tariff on raw wool and also on the finished product of woolen manufactures more than 50 per cent, and this reduction will stimulate the importation of both foreign-grown wool and foreign-manufactured woolen goods into this country. Then, if it is not a revenue bill, what is it? Does the imposition of a duty on raw wool violate any fundamental or cardinal principle of the Democracy? I deny that it does.

I believe in free raw wool as a sound economic policy. Before the Democratic caucus acted upon this bill I favored placing raw wool on the free list, and I voted in the caucus for the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. MACON] to put raw wool on the free list. So without surrendering my views as to the wisdom of the position long adhered to by Democrats in Congress in favor of free raw wool or in favor of the broader doctrine of free raw material, I shall vote for this bill with a provision in it providing for a duty on raw wool. I do not apologize for but justify my action in so doing on the ground that the duty imposed is lower than the rate fixed in the present law, and that same is deemed necessary at this time for purposes of revenue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This brings me to the consideration of the great issue between the Republican and Democratic Parties on the tariff question. There is to-day and has always been a fundamental distinction and vital issue between these two great parties in regard to the principle that should control Congress in the imposition of tariff taxes. The Republican Party stands for the principle of protection. The Democratic Party has always opposed, and to-day opposes that principle and stands for a tariff for revenue. The Republican Party insists that duties on imports should be levied with the view of protecting our home industries, and in their latest declaration on the subject declared that these duties should be sufficient to guarantee to American manufacturers a reasonable profit. In justice to the Republican Party I deem it proper to state in this connection that they also insist that the protective policy of their party is imposed for the benefit of American labor. In my own opinion this latter contention is wholly untenable, and is merely made to delude the working classes into supporting a system of taxation that is detrimental to their best interest. The Democratic Party opposes the doctrine of protection either for the purpose of protecting our manufacturers or benefiting our laborers or farmers. The Democratic position is that the tariff is a tax, and that the only justification for the imposition of any tariff duties whatsoever is the needs of the Government, and that no duty should be imposed except such as may be necessary in order to raise revenues to carry on the Government economically administered. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Our contention and position is that a tariff imposed with any other view or for any other purpose is wholly unjustifiable. Under this view the imposition of prohibitive tariffs is utterly indefensible and intolerable. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, let us consider for a moment the practical workings of these two divergent theories in regard to tariff taxation in their last analysis. In order to secure protection, the Republican Party, the party of protection, stands for the imposition of high rates of duty. Under the operation of this system the party in control of the Government through a long series of years whenever it has become necessary to modify or revise our tariff laws has carried in the new bill higher average rates than in the preceding bill. Hence the last tariff law enacted by the Republican Party carries higher rates of duty than any tariff law ever enacted by Congress, and hence places upon the people of the United States heavier burdens than were ever imposed by any former act. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the other hand, the Democratic Party stands for a tariff for revenue, and hence stands for the doctrine of low rates of duty, such as will produce the greatest amount of revenue with the lightest burden to the people. In harmony with this view the Democratic Party in Congress opposed at every step the iniquitous Payne-Aldrich tariff bill and are now engaged in an earnest effort to revise it schedule by schedule, so as to bring the duties down to a strictly revenue basis. The President of the United States declared, in his Winona speech, shortly after the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, that it was the best tariff law that had ever been enacted by the Congress of the United States. From the standpoint of the protectionist, I am willing to concede that the President was eminently correct in that statement.

The law provides for a higher degree of protection to American manufacturers and special interests than any other tariff law ever enacted. It affords more and better protection than can be found in any previous enactment. But the people generally do not like it. Republicans generally do not like it. Insurgent Republicans, like Democrats, do not believe in too much protection. From the standpoint of those opposed to special privileges, who believe in fairness and justice to the whole American people, I do not hesitate to declare that the Payne-Aldrich tariff law is the most oppressive tariff legislation ever enacted in the entire history of the Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Having thus analyzed the positions of the two parties upon this vital issue, let us now inquire who is right. Who stands for the correct principle? The application of which of these principles is best for the American people as a whole? Now, the special interests, the beneficiaries of tariff legislation, favor protection through selfish motives. We can never hope to influence them to stand against the system by argument or by altruistic appeals to their generosity, but the great body of the American people are not beneficiaries of this system. And I have no doubt that they have been induced to support the principle of protection in the past because they honestly believed it was right.

Conceding honesty of opinion in their past support of the protective system, I appeal to them to consider this great question from the standpoint of reason, logic, and common sense. And if we can convince them that we are right and that the Republicans are wrong on this tariff question, I believe they will vote with us in the future.

The exceeding high cost of living has become burdensome to every class of our citizens. The only power lodged in the Congress of the United States to relieve the people from the burdens of the high cost of living is the power to reduce our present high tariff rates and place our home manufacturers in competition with foreign manufacturers, and the further power to strengthen our antitrust laws. Under the system of protection so long fostered and upheld by the Republican Party, other evils have grown up in this country. The American manufacturers enjoying special privileges in the form of law-made profits have prospered beyond the dreams of avarice.

Realizing the advantages of being without foreign competition by reason of the protective tariff, they have formed pools, combinations, gentlemen's agreements, and thereby destroyed in a large measure domestic or home competition, and the American people to-day are compelled to buy food, clothing, and other articles of daily necessity and comfort and to pay therefor the arbitrary prices fixed by the combines or trusts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In this connection and as bearing directly upon the question, I desire to call attention to and read an extract from the dissenting opinion of Justice Harlan in the Standard Oil case. He said:

> In order that my objections to certain parts of the court's opinion may distinctly appear, I must state the circumstances under which Congress passed the antitrust act and trace the course of judicial decisions as to its meaning and scope. This is the more necessary because the court, by its decision, when interpreted by the language of its opinion, has not only upset the long-settled interpretation of the act, but has usurped the constitutional functions of the legislative branch of the Government. With all due respect for the opinions of others, I feel bound to say that what the court has said may well cause some alarm for the integrity of our institutions. Let us see how the matter stands.
> All who recall the condition of the country in 1890 will remember that there was everywhere among the people generally a deep feeling of unrest. The Nation had been rid of human slavery—fortunately, as all now feel—but the conviction was universal that the country was in real danger from another kind of slavery sought to be fastened on the American people, namely, the slavery that would result from aggregations of capital in the hands of a few individuals and corporations controlling, for their own profit and advantage exclusively, the entire business of the country, including the production and sale of the necessaries of life. Such a danger was thought to be then imminent, and all felt that it must be met firmly and by such statutory regulations as would adequately protect the people against oppression and wrong. Congress therefore took up the matter and gave the whole subject the fullest consideration. All agreed that the National Government could not, by legislation, regulate the domestic trade carried on wholly within the several States; for power to regulate such trade remained with, because never surrendered by, the States. But, under authority expressly granted to it by the Constitution, Congress could regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign States. Its authority to regulate such commerce was and is paramount, due force being given to other provisions of the fundamental law devised by the fathers for the safety of the Government and for the protection and security of the essential rights inhering in life, liberty, and property.
> Guided by these considerations, and to the end that the people, so far as interstate commerce was concerned, might not be dominated by vast combinations and monopolies having power to advance their own selfish ends, regardless of the general interests and welfare, Congress passed the antitrust act of 1890 in these words:
> "SEC. 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.
> "SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.
> "SEC. 3. Every contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or in restraint of trade or commerce between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations is hereby declared illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court." (26 Stat., 209, c. 647.)

The Sherman antitrust act was passed in 1890. It provides that every contract, combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States shall be unlawful, and also further provides that every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. Chairman, I am not an alarmist, and I hope my views on public questions may never become chimerical, but I can not shut my eyes to the serious problem that confronts the American people to-day in dealing with the trust question. In the Standard Oil case and also in the case of the United States against the American Tobacco Co., recently decided by the Supreme Court, the court held the respective companies to be unlawful combinations operating in restraint of trade and monopolies within the meaning and intendment of the Sherman Act, and in each case entered a decree for the dissolution of the holding corporations. But no criminal prosecutions have been instituted against the officers of these great concerns, and in so far as I am advised no such prosecutions are in contemplation.

Mr. Chairman, this is a plain statute, but I charge that the same has not been enforced as it should have been enforced by the present administration or by any preceding administration. A law that is not enforced is a dead letter. Of what avail would be our statute against murder, larceny, or robbery if those intrusted with the administration of the law would not prosecute the offenders?

The antitrust law is plain. It declares all agreements and combinations in restraint of trade unlawful. It provides for the punishment by fine and imprisonment of those who enter into said combinations and agreements. Under its terms an unlawful combination or monopoly may be dissolved and the persons who enter into and engage in such unlawful combinations are guilty of criminal offenses. The efforts of the various Republican administrations to dissolve such unlawful combinations, it seems to me, have been desultory and occasional, and the criminal provisions of the statute have not been enforced at all and no serious attempt has ever been made to enforce them. Suits were brought against the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co., in cases already referred to, and the allegations against these particular companies were sustained by the Supreme Court and they have been adjudged unlawful combinations. Yet in the face of the fact that the United States Steel Corporation acquired the properties of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. and various other properties, as everybody believes, in contravention of this statute, no suit has been brought to dissolve the Steel Trust. No suit has been brought to dissolve the American Sugar Refining Co. No suits have been brought against hundreds of other combinations which, while not so powerful as those named, are equally culpable and are operating in violation of the provisions of this statute. Is the Department of Justice powerless to enforce our antitrust laws, or is the administration for some other reason unwilling to proceed against particular trusts? Has the administration forbidden the Department of Justice to prosecute individuals criminally for the violation of this statute, or is the failure to do so to be charged up to the dereliction of the Department of Justice? As a plain, blunt man, who can understand the provisions of a plain, blunt law, I should like to know who is responsible. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As a direct result of this system of unlawful monopolies, trusts, and combines, we have the high cost of living for all our people and, what is worse, a condition of industrial slavery for wage earners scarcely less galling than was the chattel slavery of the South. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yet the party of Lincoln, the party that in its origin and inception stood for universal freedom, is responsible for this condition of servitude. The Republican Party stands for a protective tariff which promotes and fosters monopolies by shutting out foreign competition. By a policy of noninterference, by declining to prosecute these great captains of industry, or their agents or subordinates, criminally for the violation of antitrust laws, it has permitted combinations to grow and multiply, the chief purpose of which is to suppress and destroy domestic competition, and all this has been done in open defiance of a plain statute that forbids their very existence. Faithless to the people, derelict in duty, recreant to its trust, the Republican Party has demonstrated its utter incompetency or disinclination to enforce our antitrust laws against these great and powerful corporations or their managers. As a result, unlawful combinations and monopolies dominate and control the commercial and business interests of the entire country, and, with the cupidity of common knaves, exploit the public to add other millions to their already swollen and ill-gotten fortunes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, permit me to say that the Republican Party has shattered the high ideals of its illustrious founders and by both its legislative and administrative policies has prostituted the high purposes of government to the promotion of special interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Lincoln stood for a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. The Republican Party of to-day stands for a government of the trusts, by the trusts, and for the trusts. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the debate upon this very important bill with much interest. I have come to regret that the discussion, it seems to me, has departed from the real merits of the bill and gone into side issues. It does not seem to me that the Members who have debated this bill have discussed it upon its merits, nor from that impartial point of view which I would like to hear. It seems that a great deal of not only partisan politics, but factional politics, have crept into this discussion. I was very much interested, as I always am, in the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas who has just finished his speech, and I agree with him in his definition of tariff. A tariff for protection only will, of course, if it is effectual, exclude importations and be prohibitive and there will be no revenue, as he said. A tariff for revenue may or may not be protective. It is protective to a limited extent if it is levied upon an article produced in this country that competes with articles that may be imported. If the duty is so high that it makes a material difference in the price, raises the price of the domestic competitive article, it becomes chiefly protective, but if you continue to raise the rate until the advantage is so great to the domesic producer as to dominate the market entirely, as I said, it becomes prohibitive and, of course, protective. Now, this bill provides for certain duties. The criticism I have heard from the Republican side has not been directed to the question as to whether or not those duties are or are not protective. The chief criticism is, as I have heard it, that the bill is brought forward here by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means as a revenue measure, and that the author of the bill not only claimed that, but that it was necessary to bring such a bill because of the depleted condition of the Treasury, and that proposition has been refuted. Well, that does not exactly go to the merits of this measure, to my notion.

The further criticism might be made that this bill is not chiefly a revenue bill. The Democrats have defended it upon the ground that it is in harmony with Democratic principles, to wit, that a tariff must be levied for revenue only, and that the protection that necessarily results when it reaches a competitive article is an incident that is not at all controlling or influencing of their action in levying that duty. That has been reiterated over and over again. Now, upon that question as to whether or not this is a Democratic bill in its essence, we ought to take the opinion of the leading Democrat of the country, Mr. Bryan, the peerless leader of the Democracy. And he has, both in interviews and in his paper, the Commoner, come out and declared that this is not a Democratic measure; that it is a repudiation of Democratic principles; and that it is a surrender to the Republican doctrine of protection, or words to that effect. Well, I have studied this bill for some time since it has been up here for discussion, and I have been almost persuaded that Mr. Bryan is right in his criticism of the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman thinks Mr. Bryan is right about this bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. I certainly do.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did the gentleman hear the letter read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES] from Mr. Bryan this afternoon?

Mr. STEENERSON. I did not hear any letter read from Mr. Bryan this afternoon. What I say is, that I have read in the papers that he has condemned this bill as not in harmony with the Democratic platform.

Mr. HEFLIN. In this letter he said this bill is better than any bill that could come from the Republican Party.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is a mere quibble. He does not retract, then, what he said before, and that is that this bill is not a Democratic measure. It may be better than a bad bill from a Democratic point of view, but the very fact that Mr. Bryan condemns it does not make it a bad bill. To my notion it makes it a good bill, because I do not believe in the principles in which Mr. Bryan believes. This bill, if I understand it—and if I do not I hope to be enlightened before we come to a vote—is a repudiation and an abandonment of the principles of the Democratic Party and constitutes a fulfillment of the promises of the Republican Party in their last national platform to impose duties equal to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. The Democratic Party, as it is organized in this House, has brought in a Republican measure, and it constitutes a fulfillment of our party promises to a very much greater degree than the bill brought in by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], which I voted against.

Mr. CARTER and Mr. FOWLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLDFIELD in the chair). To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman says this is a Republican bill. I want to know if he is going to support it?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am liable to do so unless I am convinced that I am mistaken in my views. [Applause.] I will say to the gentleman that if I am not mistaken in the views I have expressed this bill deserves to pass. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I may be mistaken. But, as I understand this bill, it is a protective measure and not a Democratic one, not a bill providing for revenue duties, but duties intended largely for protection.

When you levy a duty upon a competitive article—that is to say, an article that is produced in this country at least in sufficiently large quantities to supply a large part of the demand and the production of which may be so stimulated as to increase it to the extent that it will supply the whole demand—then you are dealing with a commodity that is a suitable subject of a protective tariff.

If you levy a small duty so as to permit importations and not to stimulate greatly the production of that commodity, then you have a revenue duty. On the other hand, if you levy a duty that is so high as to make importations difficult or rather small, you have considerable protection.

Now, here is this article of wool. We have never produced all of the wool that we have consumed in this country. It is claimed by the enthusiasts in that industry that sufficient wool could be produced in this country to supply the entire demand if proper encouragement were given to the industry. However, we have had a very high protective tariff for more than a generation, and we have never greatly increased the production in proportion to the size of the country or the population, so that this is a commodity which, without undue or extraordinary stimulation, does not supply more than a half, or a little more than a half, of the demands of the people.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question.

Mr. RAINEY. Is it not true that the more people we have in a country like this the less sheep we have?

Mr. STEENERSON. I believe the gentleman is mistaken. I believe we have more sheep now, with one exception, than we ever had, and we have more people than we ever had.

Mr. RAINEY. I can not agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. STEENERSON. We have 57,000,000 sheep at the present time, and I understand that is more than we ever had, except in 1900–1903, when there was an abnormal increase to 63,000,000, which fell in 1905 to 45,000,000, and we have 92,000,000 people, and that is more people than we ever had before. It may be that we have a less number of sheep per capita than we have had at some other time. But I say that the amount of wool produced does not supply our demand. I believe that the latest figures are that we produce 56 per cent and import 44 per cent. That being the case, wool is a subject which is properly embodied either in a revenue tariff or a protective tariff.

The same situation exists as to sugar. We never produce the total amount of sugar that we require, and, therefore, there must be a large percentage of our consumption imported every year. Sugar has therefore been a subject of a tariff which the Republicans claim is largely a revenue tariff, because it brings in some $60,000,000 of revenue, and which others claim is a protective tariff to the sugar producers, especially the beet-sugar producers of the West, and some other States, and the cane-sugar growers of the South.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that once for all I decline to yield.

I was saying that sugar is a commodity that, possibly, resembles wool in this particular, that its production could be so stimulated that the entire demand might be supplied in this country. There is hardly any limit to the amount of beets that could be produced, and perhaps the cane production could also be increased; so that that duty is not only a revenue duty, but is, to a great extent, a protective duty.

Here, then, we have a bill that proposes a duty on raw wool of 20 per cent, and upon the manufactures of wool of 40 and 45 per cent. I believe there are some forms of manufactured products that are a little lower, but those are the main items, 40 and 45 per cent.

Now, I will submit to anyone who will carefully look into the matter and be fair that the proposed duty, so far as raw wool is concerned, is more than the farmer, the producer of the wool, has received during the last five years. If we take the last five years and compare the price of wool in London and in Boston for exactly the same kind of commercial wool we will find that the difference in favor of the domestic price of wool for the last five years has been 3½ cents a pound.

In only one year; that is, the year 1905—and I have this table furnished to me by a gentleman who is posted on the wool business—in only the year 1905, when there was, owing to a small supply, an undue and extraordinary demand for raw wool in this country, did the producers of wool get the benefit of the specific duty of 11 cents to the amount of 10 cents a pound. Take it for 11 years back, and the average enhancement of the price of wool to the producer by the duty has been substantially 4 cents. It is higher for the last five years, because it includes this extraordinary year of 1905, at 10 cents.

Now, that is all the protection that the farmer who actually produced the wool got, and I will explain the reason, as it appears to me, later on.

The average price of wool has been more than 20 cents in London, ranging all the way from 19 to 33 cents. If you base the ad valorem duty of 20 per cent on that London price, you will give a higher protection than the farmers of the United States who produce wool have received in the past. Therefore I say that, so far as the wool producer is concerned, the proposed duty is higher than the duty that is in effect under the complicated system of fictitious compensatory, ad valorem, and specific duties that we are now imposing, and which result, in my opinion, to the benefit of the manufacturer, who robs the producer of the wool of the protection intended for him.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SISSON. I have listened with interest to the gentleman's argument. I have gathered from what I heard—I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's speech—that the bill now proposed as a substitute for Schedule K is a very much better bill than Schedule K as now written in the Payne-Aldrich law——

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman from Mississippi went into the Supreme Court room and listened to one of the judges delivering his opinion, he would hardly expect to interrupt the judge and ask him what his conclusion was until he got to it. [Laughter.] Now, I have said some things that indicate the conclusion.

Mr. SISSON. I judge that, and I am glad of it.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am very glad that you can anticipate the result.

Mr. SISSON. I am glad that I can.

Mr. STEENERSON. But there are other reasons which, if the gentleman will permit me to proceed, may perhaps be more convincing than anything I have already said.

Mr. SISSON. I hope so.

Mr. STEENERSON. The other day, while the question of wool was under discussion here, I listened with interest to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and although I think he claimed that in one instance the difference in the price to the wool producer by reason of the tariff had been as high as 11 or 12 cents, he admitted that at the present time we were practically on an export basis, and that we had several times been on an export basis, so that the woolgrowers were not receiving more than the wool was worth for export.

Now, somebody must get some advantage in this specific duty. Exactly who, it is difficult to tell. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], during the discussion with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], stated that it had been claimed by the woolgrowers of Colorado that they had sold their wool for 12 cents a pound under the specific duty of 11 cents a pound. If, therefore, the amount of the specific duty, 11 cents, was added to the price paid to the woolgrower as compared with the foreign price, the foreign price must have been 1 cent, which of course is ridiculous.

I privately asked those gentlemen if they could tell me what the reason was that the producer of the wool did not get the benefit of the specific duty of 11 cents, or 12 cents on some wool, but I got no satisfactory answer, and I had to study the question from my own point of view.

Now, as I have stated frankly several times, I do not claim to be an expert, but there is an explanation, for certainly no wool comes in here, either raw or manufactured, that is not enhanced in price before it reaches the consumer of the wool garments by the amount of the duty. And why the farmer who produces the wool does not get the advanced price is the problem that I have not yet been able to solve satisfactorily, although I have been indulging in some guessing, and I am going to give you these suggestions with the idea that before we vote upon this bill perhaps some of you gentlemen who are more expert in the matter of wool can explain it.

There is a very fair statement of the law in regard to raw wool—that is, the tariff duties on different classes of wool—in the report on this bill, and I think I shall insert a part of it in my speech, and also some of the definitions of technical terms.

UNMANUFACTURED WOOLS.

The act of 1909 made no change in the act of 1897 as to classifications, duties, and provisions covering raw or unmanufactured wools. The unmanufactured wools are now provided for in paragraphs 360 to 371, both inclusive, of the act of 1909 (pars. 348 to 360, both inclusive, of the act of 1897). In this prevailing scheme of duties the raw wools are divided for tariff purposes into three classes.

Class 1, generally known as carding or clothing wools, are described as—

"merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castel Branco, Adrianople skin wool or butcher's wool, and such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Egypt, Morocco, and elsewhere, and all wools not hereinafter included in classes 2 and 3."

These are fine wools, short in fiber, and are used for carding and spinning into woolen yarn. They consist principally of wools from sheep of merino blood, and are imported mainly from Australia and Argentina. These wools of class 1 are now dutiable at 11 cents per pound when unwashed, which means "shorn from the sheep without any cleansing"—that is, in their natural condition and when "not on the skin." If washed, these wools are taxed "twice the amount of the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed," which means 22 cents per pound when not on the skin. When the wool is on the skin, the duty is 1 cent less per pound than it would be if the same wool were not on the skin. If these wools of class 1 are scoured, the duty is "three times the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed," which means 33 cents per pound. Washed wools are considered only "such as have been washed with water only on the sheep's back, or on the skin." If washed in any other manner, they are considered and taxed as scoured wool.

Class 2, generally known as combing wools, are described as—

"Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and also hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals."

These are long-fibered combing wools—that is, wools which are used for combing and spinning into worsted yarns. They come principally from the English breeds of long-haired sheep, such as the Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Romney Marsh, and Leicesters. The quantity of class 2 wools imported is much smaller than the quantities of classes 1 and 3, and they come principally from the United Kingdom. These wools of class 2 are now dutiable at 12 cents per pound, either washed or unwashed, when not on the skin, or at 11 cents per pound when on the skin. If scoured, class 2 wools are taxed three times the duty on unwashed wool, or 36 cents per pound. While class 1 wools when washed are taxed twice the amount of the duty on the unwashed—that is, 22 cents per pound in the fleece, or not on the skin—class 2 wools in the same condition are taxed no more than when unwashed—that is, 12 cents per pound not on the skin or 11 cents if on the skin. The great bulk of the importations of raw wools of all classes are not on the skin. The very special favor given to class 2 wools in permitting their importation when washed at no higher duty than when unwashed is for the particular benefit of the importers of class 2 wools, who are principally the manufacturers using these wools, which shrink the least in washing and scouring.

Class 3, coarse wools used only for carpets, are described as—

"Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, Russian camel's hair, and all such wools of like character as have heretofore been usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for."

Carpet wools are not produced to any extent in the United States, and form a large part of our wool imports. They are brought mainly from China, Russia, the United Kingdom, and Turkey. These class 3 wools are the coarsest and cheapest and do not enter into the manufacture of clothing except occasionally and to a very slight extent. These wools in the present act are divided into two subclasses, according to value. Those valued at 12 cents or less per pound are dutiable at 4 cents per pound either washed or unwashed and not on the skin; those valued at over 12 cents per pound are dutiable at 7 cents per pound either washed or unwashed and not on the skin. As to both of these subclasses of class 3 wools, the above-mentioned rates are 1 cent per pound less if the wool is on the skin or three times the amount if it is scoured.

There is also in the present act a special provision by which the duty is doubled on wools of class 1 and class 2, "which shall be imported in any other than ordinary condition, or which has been sorted or increased in value by the rejection of any part of the original fleece," except that this provision does not apply to "skirted wools as imported in 1890 and prior thereto." Skirted wools are those in which the coarsest and least valuable wool has been removed from the fleece. The meaning of the exception in this provision is that wools which were commercially "skirted" in or prior to 1890 are not doubly taxed as sorted wools under the general terms of the provision.

Imported wools are assigned to the classes above mentioned according to standard samples in the customhouses. It is also provided that whenever wools of class 3—

"shall have been improved by the admixture of Merino or English blood from their present character, as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty either as class 1 or as class 2, as the case may be."

The object of this provision is to apply the higher duties to class 3 wools should they come in in such improved condition as to make them fit for use in the manufacture of clothing.

There is no sufficient reason for continuing the complicated and troublesome system of classification of raw wools, with the differentiations, qualifications, exceptions, and special provisions involved therein. This system is a great burden and annoyance to the customs service and adds to the expense of collecting duties on raw wools. It adds to the labors of the appraisers and causes constant friction, annoyance, and litigation in the admission of imports and collection of duties. This system was provided and elaborated as a part of the establishment of specific and high duties on wool. The division of the wools into three classes appears first in the act of 1867. Raw wools are of so many varieties and involve so many shades of difference in kind, quality, condition, and use that it is not possible to apply specific duties to them without a number of differentiations and special qualifications and provisions. It is plain that the existing complicated and vexatious arrangement of specific duties on wool can not be permitted to continue. Natural conditions prevent the just operation of the arrangement. Wools are not used at all in the absolutely raw or greasy state as clipped from the sheep and as they usually come to the market. In this state the wool is loaded down with animal grease, dried sweat, dirt, sand, and other foreign substances. It must be scoured and dried before passing to any stage of manufacture. In the scouring and drying the wool shrinks, and the shrinkage varies greatly.

There is an almost endless variety of wools, according to the breed of the sheep and admixtures thereof, the countries and sections where the sheep are raised, and the conditions affecting the grazing and keeping. Almost every kind and variety of wool shrinks to a different degree in passing from the greasy to the scoured state, depending upon the variety and handling of the sheep. Some wools shrink only 20 per cent, leaving 80 per cent of the weight clean and available for use. Other wools shrink 80 per cent, leaving only 20 per cent of the weight clean and available for use. Between these percentages of shrinkage there are all possible variations in the wools imported and in the domestic wools with which they compete. Moreover, wools will vary to some extent in shrinkage in being transferred from the scoured condition into the finished cloth.

The mere weight or bulk of the wool is not of much significance, as the utility of the fiber, and hence its value, depends on the amount and quality of what is left after scouring and working into the finished fabric. It is the scoured weight obtained that determines the quantity of cloth that will be produced. The National Association of Wool Manufacturers, of Boston, Mass., published in their bulletin for 1910 the percentages of shrinkage of American wools, and their figures in this matter may be taken as conservative. They show that the wools of the group of States known as the East North Central States (Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin), which may be taken as fairly and conservatively representative of the light-shrinkage wools of this country, shrink on an average 49 per cent from the greasy to the scoured condition. Those of the South Atlantic States average 44 per cent of such shrinkage. The wools of the Mountain States (Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, and Nevada), which are the principal heavy-shrinking wools, average 66 per cent in shrinkage from the greasy to the scoured condition.

As has been stated, Schedule K of the present act provides that the duty per pound on scoured wool in either of the three classes shall be three times the duty per pound on the unwashed wool. This involves the assumption that 3 pounds of unwashed wool are required to produce 1 pound of scoured wool—that is, that the shrinkage is two-thirds, or 66⅔ per cent. This assumption is not based on fact. Some wools shrink two-thirds, a few more than this, but a great many considerably less. The worsted manufacturers gain a special advantage right along in importing light-shrinking wools. When they import 1,000 pounds of wool similar to or competing with the East North Central wool (or buy the East North Central wool), they pay in duties (or advance in domestic prices if the tariff is effective as protection) $120, at 12 cents per pound in the grease (the rate on class 2 wools). The result in the scoured condition is 51 per cent (after 49 per cent shrinkage), or 510 pounds, which have paid $120 in duties (or equivalent in advanced price), or at the rate of about 23½ cents per pound on a scoured basis. When the carded woolen manufacturers import 1,000 pounds of wool similar to or competing with the Mountain States wool (or use the Mountain States wool at prices advanced by the amount of the duty), they pay in duties (or addition to price) $110, at 11 cents per pound in the grease (the rate on class 1 wools). The result in the scoured condition is 34 per cent (after 66 per cent shrinkage), or 340 pounds, which have paid $110 in duties (or equivalent in advanced price), or at the rate of about 32⅓ cents per pound on a scoured basis.

On a scoured basis, the wool which the carded woolen manufacturers must use is therefore taxed about 9 cents per pound more than the wool the worsted manufacturers must use. The average price of Territorial (or Mountain States) clothing wools on a scoured basis in the latest available market quotations (May 19, 1911) was 55 cents per pound.

If 9 cents of this price is the amount of the special discrimination made by the present tariff against the carded-woolen manufacturers and in favor of their competitors, the worsted manufacturers, it means that the carded-woolen manufacturers must struggle against a special and unjust discrimination against them amounting to over 16 per cent of the cost of all the wool they use. The carded-woolen manufacturers claim that the discrimination against them is even greater than as estimated above. It appears that, because of the specific or pound duties, only the very lightest shrinking wool is imported, and the average shrinkage of the class 1 and class 2 wools imported is estimated at 40 per cent. On this estimate in a importation of 1,000 pounds of wool in the grease, the result in scoured wool is 60 per cent, or 600 pounds, which, the greasy wool having paid $120 in duties, is at the rate of 20 cents per pound on a scoured basis.

* * * * * * *

The unevenly heavy duty on the heavy-shrinking wool may be supposed to benefit a number of the American woolgrowers, those producing the heavy-shrinking wools. Such, however, does not appear to be the case. It is not believed that the great majority of American growers of wool, heavy-shrinking or otherwise, favor a tariff which would give them a special advantage against others of their fellow citizens. The real situation appears to be that the uneven burdens imposed on the use of heavy-shrinking wools have seriously injured the carded-woolen manufacturers. According to their statements, their output has been seriously restricted, which means the closing of mills or much less work therein, to the distress of the workers, and much less use of raw wool than if their industry were permitted to make its way unhampered by legal discrimination. The American heavy-shrinking wools must find their market in the carded-woolen manufactures.

Carding is the process of opening up the fibers and making the wool loose and workable. The carding engines consist of large cylinders on which revolve smaller cylinders, the surfaces of which are covered with fine teeth, the cylinders revolving in different directions and at different speeds. The wool passes between these rollers, and from one to another, finally emerging in a light, fluffy rope or roll, called a "sliver" or "strand."

* * * * * * *

Classification of wools: Under the tariff wool is divided into three classes: (1) Consists of what are called carding or "clothing" wools. These are fine wools, short in fiber, and are used for carding and spinning into woolen yarn. They consist principally of wools from sheep of merino blood, and are imported mainly from Australia and Argentina. (2) Consists of long-fibered combing wools, i. e., wools which are used for combing and spinning into worsted yarns. They come principally from the English breeds of long-haired sheep, such as the Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Romney Marsh, and Leicesters. The quantity of class 2 wools imported is much smaller than the quantities of classes 1 and 3, and they come principally from the United Kingdom. Canada also raises this class of wools, and their free entry under the reciprocal agreement of 1854–1864 served as an impetus to the establishment of the manufacture of worsteds in the United States. Combing machinery has been perfected to such an extent, however, that domestic territory wools are suitable for combing, and those that are imported are used for special purposes, where the luster of English combing wools is desirable. (3) Consists of coarse wools which are suitable only for carpets. They are not raised to any extent in the United States, and form a large part of our wool imports. They are brought mainly from China, Russia, the United Kingdom, and Turkey. Some of these wools are suitable for carding and spinning into woolen yarn, while others are long enough to be combed and spun into worsted carpet yarn.

Combing is an important step in the making of worsted yarn. It consists of combing out the wool, thus removing the short fibers which are passed on to the woolen manufacturer as noils, and leaving the long fibers arranged parallel to each other in the form called tops, ready to be drawn out and spun into worsted yarn.

Combing wools are wools of sufficiently long fiber to be combed for making worsted yarns. Originally only very long-fibered wools could be used for this purpose, but combing machinery has been perfected to such an extent that short-fibered wools can be used.

* * * * * * *

Wool extract is obtained from union cloths, also cloths having a woolen or mungo warp or filling. To reclaim the wool fiber, the vegetable matter (cotton) is extracted by the process of carbonizing. To effect this, the tissue or rags are steeped in a solution of sulphuric acid and water and then subjected to heat in an inclosed room. The water is evaporated, leaving the acid in a concentrated form, which acts upon the cotton, converting it into powder. The wool material left is washed, dried, and subsequently passed through a miniature carder to give it a woolly appearance.

Woolen cloth is made of yarn in which the fibers lie criss-cross, thus affording a fuzzy surface. When woven, the cloth has a distinct nap, which is variously treated in the finishing process. Short-fibered wools are used, and the design made in weaving does not appear distinctly in the finished goods.

Woolen yarn, a yarn made from short-fibered wool and in which the fibers lie in every conceivable direction, thus imparting a fuzzy appearance to the yarn. The cloth woven therefrom is therefore susceptible to various kinds of finishings and blendings of colors, the weave being somewhat obscured by the fuzz or nap.

Worsted cloth is made of yarn in which the fibers have been combed out so that they lie parallel to each other. Comparatively long-fibered wool is used, and the yarn has a smooth appearance, few fiber ends appearing on the surface. Consequently worsted cloths have very little nap, a hard, smooth finish, and show clearly the design effected in weaving.

Worsted yarn, a yarn made from comparatively long-fibered wool (designated as class 2 in the tariff act), the fibers having been combed out straight and parallel, thus giving a smooth and even yarn with but little fuzz. The cloth woven therefrom consequently has but little nap, thus insuring a clear and distinct pattern in the finished fabric.

With that in view I will state further that the result, it seems to me, must be due to the involved system of specific and compound duties, and the duties abnormally high, unfairly high, upon the by-products of the worsted industry. As I understand it, in the first place the worsted manufacturers who make worsted cloth use mostly the long-fiber wool, which is wool from the larger sheep as distinguished from the pure-breed merinos, and which does not shrink in washing and scouring and cleaning to the same degree as the fine merino wool which is used for dresses for ladies and children and fine cloths like broadcloths.

This wool is imported to some extent and produced here to some extent, shrinks only one-third, or 33 per cent, on an average, whereas the wool mostly used in the other branch of industry shrinks 66 per cent, or two-thirds. So, when you import a thousand pounds of wool of the former kind, you have 666 pounds left, whereas if you import 1,000 pounds of the other kind you have only 333 pounds left.

Now, the duty is based on the raw pound, and not only is there this difference, but the worsted man imports his wool washed, so instead of paying 33 cents, or three times 11 cents, he only pays 14 or 15 cents. This is a considerable advantage, but it seems also that in the turning of these wools that are capable of being used in the worsted industry there is a large per cent of short-fiber wool that comes out in the manufacture that is just as good and suitable for ordinary woolen cloth as the domestic natural wool.

There is a large amount of other by-products of still shorter fiber that are not quite so valuable. But they can not be used in the worsted industry. These by-products, consisting of so-called wool waste, must be used in the ordinary carded wool industry.

There were 27,000,000 pounds of noils produced here in this country last year, according to the report, by the worsted manufacturers, quite a large percentage of the total wool production.

These noils are valuable for the carded-wool industry. They are more valuable per pound than the wool in the grease. In fact, they are distinguished in the tariff bill as noils worth 30 cents and noils worth over 30 cents, so that some may bring as high as 40 to 60 cents. So you see that they are a valuable wool, and therefore they compete with the farmers in Montana, Wisconsin, and other parts of the country who produce the raw wool.

The worsted man, having imported some of that wool and other wool bought at the lowest price he could get, takes out the most valuable part for his business, but he still has left a product of short fiber—scoured wool—which is valuable in the carded-wool process.

We have the so-called waste, both that which is produced in the spinning and finishing of the cloth, which are all produced by the worsted manufacturers to quite a large extent. Now, the fact that the worsted manufacturer gets his wool cheaper by reason of less shrinkage in the wool that he does import, affects the price of the wool that he buys here of the same kind; for, as compared with the scoured pure fiber, the duty in his case is very small.

The worsted-wool combination becomes the dominating factor both in wool production and wool manufacture. They are in a sense wool producers as well as wool consumers and importers. Under the present law they gain an advantage, not only when they buy or import raw wool, but when they sell the raw material to the woolen or carded-wool industry. They get the benefit of the protection both ways, both as producer and consumer. They so manipulate matters that they absorb both the duty designed as protection to the farmer and the manufacturer. The result is that he has left a product ready for use in the carded-woolen mill which he got in here under a low duty when it was a part of the imported low-shrinking wool, but which can not be imported separately by anyone else without paying at least four times as much duty. In other words, the worsted man gets his raw wool in at one-half the duty, measured by the scoured contents of each pound that the other wool pays, and then a part of this wool, so imported at a low duty, is sold in competition with the high-shrinking wool, and thus the price of domestic wool is reduced almost to an export basis.

Now, I believe that these are some of the reasons why the 11 cents a pound levied on raw wool is not realized by the wool producers in this country. I believe it is due to the undue advantage that the worsted manufacturers have. It has the same effect to my notion as if you should pass a law that every factory in Philadelphia could have free wool of every description, but everybody else had to pay a duty. Of course, that would give them there a dominating influence and would depress the price elsewhere, because they could undersell anybody else. They would have an advantage. In fact, as the law is now, and has been for many years, there is an inequality in the amount of duty levied upon the one class of wool as compared with the other.

My district does not produce a great deal of wool. We have no exclusive sheep industry like they have in the Rocky Mountain country. It is more of a domestic industry. Every farmer, or nearly every one, keeps a few sheep, and some years ago we had quite a number of small carded wool factories there, and I know several that started with a good deal of financial backing, ample backing, and they tried to encourage the farmer to keep more sheep, because it is a sort of by-product of the farmer, if we may use the term, and he might very well keep a few sheep to enrich the part of his farm that had been exhausted, and is a matter to be encouraged; but for some reason that we never could fathom, the wool factories throughout Minnesota and, I think, throughout the Northwest could not compete; they were crushed out by some unseen power. As a matter of fact that has been going on for many years. In 1904 there were more than 1,100 woolen factories or concerns engaged in this worsted industry, and in 1909, according to the Census Office, there were only 900, and the product has increased very greatly. The capital involved has increased very greatly, so that it appears there has been a great concentration of capital and concentration of interest, a more complete organization, and that, to my notion, explains the reason why the woolen factories in the small villages and cities of the Northwest have had to go out of business, and consequently the raising of sheep as a domestic industry upon the farm has also been discouraged.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question.

Mr. COLLIER. That is all; just for a question. I have been very much interested in the gentleman's remarks, as I am always when the gentleman from Minnesota makes an address. I note that he states that the sheep industry, despite this tariff, has fallen off to a certain extent in his State. The gentleman does not agree, then, with the theory that has been expressed here, that if we pass a bill reducing the rates as low as this present bill that it will materially affect, if not destroy, the sheep-growing industry of the country?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that a 20 per cent ad valorem tariff on raw wool will give more protection to the wool producer than the present compound and intricate system of specific duties that gives an advantage to one over the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The gentlemen will notice that they are applauding protection on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am glad to see some of them are protectionists. I believe most of them are, though they dare not say so. [Laughter.]

Now, in regard to the duty on manufactures of wool, we will say 40 and 45 per cent. An ad valorem duty is levied and bears upon the total value of the product, so that if we say we had only 20 per cent duty on everything, when a piece of cloth was brought into New York, where the material costs 60 cents and the labor and other expenses of producing it cost 40 cents, that 20 per cent would be 12 cents on the material and 8 cents on the labor, so that you have the 20 per cent to start with. It is perfectly fair to say that a duty of 40 or 45 per cent—no; I will take that back—to say, if the cost of the material amounts to 60 per cent, then you have 8 cents as an additional duty to the difference between 40 and 20. You would have 28 per cent on the one and 33 per cent on the other, because it is levied upon the total value both of the material and the labor that is in it.

What should the duty be upon a manufactured article produced in this country in order that there might be a reasonable amount of protection? The Republican Party for many successive quadrennial periods have declared for protection, but never stated definitely what they meant by protection until 1904. Then they first inserted the qualification in their national platform that it was to be measured by the difference in cost of production here and abroad, and that was repeated in practically the same words in 1908, with the additional words "reasonable profit," of which the Democrats have complained so much, but which I expect to show they favor in this bill. Now, what is the difference in the cost of production of woolen goods and worsteds between here and the other countries. The way to find that out is to take the amount of material and what it costs. If we have a 20 per cent duty, as is proposed under this bill, add 20 per cent, and then find out how much the labor and the salaries amount to. It is strange to me that the gentlemen who drew the report on this bill had to go back to the days of Carroll D. Wright, the labor commissioner, to find out how much of the value of the product was labor, when they published in this same book here the Census Bureau statistics on this very subject for 1905 and 1909.

I will read from page 235 of the report on this bill. At the bottom there is a table, and I will insert the table, as follows:

Comparative summary of the wool manufacturing industry in the United States for 1900 and 1905.

Years.	Number of establishments.	Capital invested.	Aggregate wages.	Average number of wage earners.	Value of product.	Cost of material.
1900.....	1,414	$310,179,749	$57,933,817	159,108	$296,990,484	$181,159,127
1905.....	1,213	370,861,691	70,797,524	179,976	380,934,003	242,561,096

It is a comparative summary of the wool-manufacturing industry in the United States, 1900 and 1905. Number of establishments, 1900, 1,414; 1905, 1,213. That shows the decrease I spoke of a while ago. Capital invested, 1900, $310,000,000—I give the round numbers; 1905, $370,000,000. Quite an increase, you see. Aggregate wages, 1900, $57,000,000; 1905, $70,000,000. Average number of wage earners, 1900, 159,108; 1905, 179,976. Value of product, 1900, $295,000,000; 1905, $380,000,000. Cost of material, 1900, $181,000,000; and 1905, $242,000,000. Now, then, if you take these figures you will find it amounts to less than 19 per cent of the total, the cost of labor, aggregate wages. Now, here is the next table, on top of page 236, from the Bureau of the Census, comparative summary of the woolen and worsted industry in the United States as reported by the Bureau of the Census for 1899, 1904, and 1909:

Comparative summary of the woolen and worsted industries in the United States as reported by the Bureau of the Census for 1899, 1904, and 1909.

Years.	Number of establishments.	Capital invested.	Salaries and wages.	Average number of wage earners.	Value of product.	Cost of material.
1899....	1,221	$256,554,000	$50,126,000	125,901	$238,745,000	$148,087,000
1904....	1,018	302,767,000	61,433,000	141,998	307,942,000	197,489,000
1909....	913	415,465,000	79,214,000	162,914	419,826,000	273,466,000

I will not read the number of establishments, the capital invested, the salaries and wages. Now, mind you, this includes salaries as well as wages, and it all amounts to $79,000,000 for 1909. Average number of wage earners, 162,914; value of product, $419,000,000. They pay $79,000,000, and the value of the product is $419,000,000, and the cost of material is $273,000,000. The cost of material, in round numbers, is 65 per cent of the total value of the product. The total wages and salaries paid in this industry to produce this $419,000,000 product is 18.79 per cent; not quite 19 per cent; less than 20 per cent. That is, total wages and salaries paid in the woolen and worsted industries to produce $419,000,000 worth of product, which has $273,000,000 worth of material in it. Now——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Is the labor the only article that enters into the cost of production? Is that the only thing the gentleman considers—the cost of labor?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; we have got it all here. The material and the wages are the two important elements; but, of course, there are other charges. We understand that. But a protective tariff is only to be levied to equalize the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. Now, 45 per cent is more than the total wages involved, and it is more than the difference between the total cost of material and value of product. If we take the material, there is only 35 per cent margin between the total value of the product and the total value of the material put into the product, so that it answers the question of the gentleman entirely; and the 35 per cent includes the salaries, wages, and all other expenses. Even assuming that those people do not make any extraordinary profit—and that constitutes their profit also, because that is the total value of the product.

If anybody can show me that upon a competitive article manufactured here and manufactured abroad under similar conditions, except as to wages—because this is an old established industry—if anybody can show me that a duty of 40 per cent, or 35 per cent, ad valorem is not equal to the difference in the cost of production here and abroad I, like the man from Missouri, would like to be shown and be convinced that I am mistaken. But if these figures can be depended upon, unless I have drawn the wrong conclusion from them, why the proposed tariff in this bill is ample so far as the manufacturer of woolen and worsted goods is concerned. Therefore, this measure, it seems to me, complies with the Republican platform, which says that protective duties should at least equal the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, with a reasonable profit, and the Committee on Ways and Means, in this case, have produced a bill which fulfills that in every particular and to my notion prescribes even a higher rate for safety. I can not exactly understand why they should come in here and say that it was not a protective bill, that it was purely a revenue bill, except to ease their conscience and to show that they are still Democrats. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that they have all become protectionists, and that they have performed that wonderful feat of which Bryan so often accused Roosevelt, namely, stolen the Republican policies and adopted them under the name of tariff for revenue. They have stolen our clothes, and they are woolen clothes at that.

Mr. ALLEN. Was it not the pledge of the Democratic Party, in the last campaign to reduce the tariff gradually?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think so. I do not read the platform that way. I have heard them say in their speeches that they intended to kill the protective system by a gradual system of torture, so as to finally extinguish it, but they have not done it in this bill, if I understand it, because this furnishes ample protection; it furnishes more real protection to the wool grower than the present tariff, and it furnishes sufficient to the manufacturer not only to cover the difference in cost of production here and abroad so far as wages are concerned, but it also covers an allowance for reasonable profit. And I would be willing to have it submitted to a jury of experts in political economy and government and have it decided without regard to any private opinion at all.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the statement was made here on the floor to-day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that this ought to be deferred until we had a report from the Tariff Board. I would like to ask the gentleman if he agrees with that statement?

Mr. STEENERSON. That proposition was taken up in a Republican conference, and it seems to be the general opinion. It first appealed to me very strongly, but when I found that the Census Bureau had already reported upon the very subject of the cost of material that went into the woolen and worsted industry in 1909, and the cost of wages and salaries, and the whole value of the output, it seemed to me that it afforded me sufficient information, so that I did not have to wait for a Tariff Board, because I think that the proposed rate is amply sufficient and there is no danger whatever of the destruction of either the manufacturing of wool or the production of wool. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe the passage of this bill with the 20 per cent ad valorem duty would stimulate the production of wool not only in the Rocky Mountain States, but throughout the country on the small farms, because the manufacturer under the ad valorem 20 per cent rate could not swindle the farmer out of his 20 per cent, as he has done, according to my belief, by the present system of levying duties. And the manufacturer will have ample protection in the 40 and 45 per cent ad valorem duty. I regard it as one of the merits of this bill that we have abandoned those specific and compensatory systems. It has been testified over and over again that it is more practical to enforce an ad valorem duty on wool than these other duties. The carded-wool interests have sent petitions and letters on the subject, and I think that nobody can successfully deny, dispute, or controvert the fact that wool is a staple article, and that the contents of it can be determined by samples, so that it is just as practical to prevent fraud under an ad valorem duty as under the other system.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that is one of the merits of your bill.

Now, I may be accused of being entirely too liberal to the opposition, but I do not want to be more than fair.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. According to your idea, this gets rid of all of the intricacies of specific and ad valorem duties that are confusing?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly; and that is one of the reasons why I do not think the tariff is so awfully complicated as some think it is. If you maintain the present system of specific duties, not only on wool, but on the different grades of wool as it advances in manufacture from the grease wool to the washed wool, to the rovings and the waste, you have a system that is so complicated that it will require a Tariff Board of almighty wise men to understand it without making a blunder. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I regret that I should please the gentlemen so much, but it is my honest conviction. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am a Republican. I believe in Republican doctrines, and I believe in protection to this industry and to every other industry that can be encouraged by suitable revenue duties or suitable customs duties.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I take it that the gentleman from Minnesota is also a fair and honest man.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thank you. The farmers of my district raise sheep just as much for the mutton as for the wool, and by reciprocity the sheep as well as the lambs are admitted free from the country that constitutes our only competitor in our markets. We are apparently doomed to lose all our protection on the mutton and lamb, which to us is as important as the fleece. As to raw wool, it seems to me that the farmer will get more real protection under this bill than he now has. I will insert here in the RECORD a table prepared, as I said before, by a gentleman who is posted on the wool prices of the world and of this country for 14 years, a table that shows that the farmers have not received any more benefit from the 11 cents a pound specific duty than I have stated.

I have another reason, perhaps, for favoring this bill as a revision of the tariff. I am in considerably more of a hurry about revising the tariff now than I was before the Democrats joined with a part of the Republicans in passing the reciprocity bill. I think, from the standpoint of the free trader or the man who wants to destroy the protective system, that that was a very shrewd move. I think it was a very foolish move on the part not only of the President but of those Republicans who followed him. I think the gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee from New England, who fathered that proposition to take away the protection of the farmer and make him sell his goods in a free-trade market, made the mistake of their lives.

I recall that eight years ago, in the first Congress that I served, a gentleman from Massachusetts advocated that idea, and he did it because he wanted to reduce the cost of living and secure cheaper food, and I took occasion then in a speech to say that if the people in the manufacturing East desired to have the men who furnished the food sell it cheaper they must not expect to maintain their present duties upon their manufactured commodities; and now we find that they have succeeded, so far as this House is concerned, in passing the reciprocity proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say that we feel that we have not been treated right. The farmers of the Northwest, and I believe the farmers throughout the country generally, believe that the time has come when they must retaliate, to some extent, at least, against those people who are eternally wanting cheap raw material and then retain the duties on what they produce. I recall that the same argument was advanced on the question of free hides, and still we are paying the same old price or more for shoes.

Now, it has been stated with reference to this bill on this floor that it was not intended to pass. Some gentleman stated that it was not expected to pass the Senate.

I believe there is an excellent chance for this bill to become a law. In the event that Canadian reciprocity shall be forced through, then the sentiment in favor of this bill as well as other tariff-revision bills will be greatly strengthened; and if Members of either House fail to respond thereto they will hear from the farmers of the United States. I have not yet said that I was going to vote for this bill, but I have said that unless I am mistaken in the information I have and the facts I have given you and the conclusions drawn therefrom, then there is no reason why it should not become a law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KONOP].

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Chairman, the tariff question has probably been the most important question in American politics. It is one of the most important questions before the American people to-day. In addition to that, I believe it has also been the most discussed question in American politics. For over 100 years it has been discussed before the American people. It has been discussed upon the floor of this House, and at the other end of the Capitol, and on the stump. So this evening, in the short space of time that I have, I will probably say some things that may have been said before upon this subject.

Mr. Chairman, the tariff question is also a lasting question. It has not been settled, although it has been discussed so long, and probably will not be settled for some time to come. Why is it such a lasting question? Why has this important tariff question not been settled before? The reason is because no question is settled until it is settled right. [Applause.] And you will not settle the tariff question until you settle it right; and in order to settle it right you must eliminate the principle of protection from it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Tariff legislation comes under that section of the Constitution which was quoted by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], which provides that Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the people.

Mr. Chairman, when you pervert this power of taxation given to Congress under that section of the Constitution into a power to grant special privileges, you are doing a wrong, and it needs no figures to prove that you are doing a wrong.

What are we here for? We are here as the representatives of all the people of this country. I do not stand upon the floor of this House as a representative of the woolgrowers of this country. I do not stand upon the floor of the House as a representative of the woolen industry, or of the steel industry; but I stand here as a representative of the 90,000,000 people who must buy the necessary clothing and who must bear the burden of taxation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When you pervert the power of taxation, when you prostitute it for the benefit of special privilege, you do not legislate for the 90,000,000 of people, but you legislate for the special interests. When you enact a tariff law for the purpose of protecting the so-called business interests that you gentlemen on that side of the House are talking about, you enact special and class legislation. No man here or anywhere can claim that the framers of our Constitution intended that this taxing clause of the Constitution should be used for granting special privileges.

Mr. Chairman, what is the history of tariff making? No tariff law enacted was ever satisfactory. After the enactment of every protective-tariff law dissatisfaction arose and agitation for its modification or repeal began. Why? Because every tariff act passed for the purpose of protection was wrong, for it necessarily was unjust, wrong, and illegal taxation. And even when a tariff for revenue was enacted by the Democrats, agitation against it was started by a few who had been weaned from public favors and been denied their usual plunder that they had expected as a result of their lobbying before the committees here in Washington. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, gentlemen, it is only two years since the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and we are here in special session to revise it.

That law, which was pronounced by the priests of protection as the best tariff law ever enacted, has been repudiated at the polls, and rightfully so, for it was special and class legislation—legislation for the favor-seeking interests.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the tariff question will not and can not be settled right until we eliminate protection. I am absolutely opposed to divorces, but there is one relation for which it can be sanctioned and justified and for which relation I heartily advocate it, and that is the illegal and illicit relation that exists now between Mr. Tariff and Mrs. Protection; and upon the granting of the divorce I would not allow Mrs. Protection one red cent of alimony. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the tariff is a tax proposition. We are here to levy a tax. We are not here to protect the sheep raisers of the State of Ohio or of the West. We are not here to protect the woolen industries of New England, but we are here to levy a duty for the purpose of raising revenue under section 8 of Article I of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, not only is the tariff a tax, but it is an indirect tax. The tax problem is difficult in itself. A tax is liable to be unjust. The tax problem is a great problem to solve. To levy a tax so that it will be justly and fairly laid upon the people of this country is difficult. The people do not object to being taxed, but they object to the inequality and injustice in taxes that are not just. The tariff is an indirect tax, and under it the people do not know how much taxes they really pay. When you couple with this indirect taxation the proposition of protecting the industries of the country indirectly you are making the taxing problem more difficult than ever. You are obscuring, then, two things—the amount of the tax and the amount of protection. You do not show the people how much taxes they pay, and they can not know and never will find out how much protection the special interests are getting. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I can not understand how any man, be he Republican, Socialist, or Democrat, or whatever political faith you please—how any man can defend the proposition of protecting industries by taxing the people. As I said before, we are not here to legislate for industries; we are here to levy a tax, and that is what tariff legislation should be.

Mr. Chairman, this protective policy is wrong. It is legislating for the different favor-seeking interests throughout the country. When a protective-tariff bill is in process of enactment all the different interests of the country appear before the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee, and they are asked, Well, gentlemen, how much do you want? And what is it that this one wants; and not one taxpayer appears to say, How much taxes are you going to levy on me? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Two propositions are involved in a tax—the amount of revenue that is necessary and how to raise it equitably and justly. Instead of considering these two propositions, you gentlemen on that side have been summoning representatives of special interests and asking them how much plunder they wanted to collect from the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, as has been demonstrated by a gentleman, Mr. GOEKE, on this side of the House, protection creates trusts. He demonstrated that it was a trust breeder. Why, men, high priests of protection have admitted that the tariff was the parent of conditions that produced trusts. That means that it is the mother of them. Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Shaw, ex-governor of Iowa, made that statement at one time, and he was a high-protectionist. Protective tariff has been the cause of all the combinations and trusts and monopolies in this country.

Mr. Chairman, not only that, it has been the cause of all the political corruption in this country. Every special interest that has been seeking special favors under tariff taxation has interfered in politics. The protective tariff has thrown business into politics. The protective tariff has become a business asset. Why, I read in the paper the other day that the National Association of Manufacturers at their convention went on record favoring the taking of the tariff out of politics, because tinkering with the tariff interfered with their business. Oh, yes; they want to take the tariff question out of politics, so that the representatives of the people could not revise it in the interests of the people. Every business in this country should stand on its own merits. It should not be a subject of charity. We are not to legislate for the manufacturers; we are here to legislate for the entire people. If the manufacturers and the other favor seekers would keep their nose out of tariff legislation they would not need to cry to take the tariff out of politics.

Mr. Chairman, this system of protection has not protected labor, and I will insert in this connection two tables. First, I will insert a table, taking the figures from a pamphlet by the Woolen Trust that they have been distributing among Members of Congress:

Development of woolen and worsted manufacturing in the United States, 1889–1909.

[Compiled from reports of United States Census Bureau.]

Years.	Total number of employees.	Total salaries and wages paid.	Average annual wages paid.	Value of products.	Remarks.
1889....	122,944	$44,359,114	$361	$212,772,629	Tariff law of 1883; McKinley bill 1890; Wilson bill 1894; Dingley bill 1897.
1899....	129,516	50,126,000	387	238,745,000	Dingley bill 1897.
1904....	146,322	61,433,000	419	307,942,000	Do.
1909[1]...	168,239	79,214,000	478	419,826,000	Payne-Aldrich bill 1909.

[1] Preliminary figures issued by Census Bureau.

Increase in value of products 1904-1909 was greater than in any ten years prior to 1900.

I do not know whether the figures in this table are correct or not, but I suppose some of them, at least, are. From their own figures I have figured out the following table of figures:

Years.	Average annual value of products produced by each employee.	Average annual wages paid.	Per cent of increase in value of products produced by each employee.	Per cent of increase of wages.
1889	$1,730	$361	.....	.....
1899	1,843	387	6.5	7.2
1904	2,104	419	14.1	8.2
1909	2,495	478	18.6	14.0

This table shows that the average annual value of the product produced by each employee has increased, while the wages have not correspondingly increased. It shows that the value of the product of each employee has increased 5 per cent more than his wages. The above wage scale, being prepared by the trust, includes salaries, and very likely some of the officers' salaries, especially of those that do the most banqueting and very little work, are very high; hence the wage scale in this industry appears high from their table.

Oh, gentlemen, how can it protect labor? It can not protect labor, because the employer who gets the tariff benefits is by no law compelled to distribute them among labor. I suppose the gentlemen on that side of the House depend upon the good, sympathetic heart of the trust magnate. Why, gentlemen, his heart is as as hard as flint. He knows not humanity nor sympathy. Why, I would rather vote for an appropriation right here of $100,000,000, to distribute it to labor directly, than to vote for a protective tariff and hand it to trust magnates, manufacturers, and employers of labor and trust to their distribution of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am in favor of such an appropriation rather than sham protection to labor, because the employer of labor has not been distributing the tariff plunder among his employees. Mr. Chairman, instead of protecting labor, the protective tariff has antagonized labor against capital. It has caused all this war between capital and labor. I want to tell you that all the labor troubles, all the strikes, all the fights between labor and capital have been caused by the protective system, because the manufacturer and the laboring classes did not know how to agree upon a division of the public plunder.

Mr. Chairman, who produces capital in this country? Capital is produced by labor. Is capital necessary? Yes, Mr. Chairman; capital is necessary to apply labor. Both are essentials in our great progress, and they should not be antagonized against each other; they should be harmonized. But instead, this protective policy, whereby you enable the employer to collect the tribute and distribute it to the employee, causes labor to organize into labor unions; and the only time labor ever got any fruits of protection was when the labor unions, through their organization, made a demand on the employer to deliver the goods. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill, I think, is probably the best bill that could be brought into this House. It is a tariff-for-revenue bill. Oh, we must expect that gentlemen on the other side of the House will criticize it. Oh, yes, they will, and they always do; but I notice that on that side of the House, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] spoke, he said:

Now, gentlemen, I am simply talking about the demerits of this bill, and I am not going to talk about Schedule K of the present law—I am simply talking about the demerits of this bill.

When the question is put to them as to whether they approve of Schedule K in their own law, which bears the name of that distinguished protectionist, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], with a hyphen after it, and then the name of the distinguished ex-Senator from Rhode Island—peace be to his political ashes—they do not say "yes" or "no." They are afraid to say "yes" and they do not dare to say "no," because it is a Republican law. They will not commit themselves, and they know why, because Schedule K has been repudiated by the American people at the polls. This proposed bill cuts the duties practically in two and reduces the revenue only about 3 per cent. Just think of it, gentlemen. It reduces the revenue of this Government only 3 per cent, from $41,000,000 to $40,000,000, and it is a cut of about 50 per cent in taxes. We can get some idea as to the amount that the protected interests in this Schedule K as it is now written have been getting by means of this protection fraud.

Mr. Chairman, who is it that objects to this bill? From whom do we get the pamphlets, the circulars, and the letters? Is it the laboring man who is struggling, who has a family to clothe? No; but it is the organized protected interests. They are the ones that are talking to us here and trying to have us recede from this gradual reduction in the tariff rates, and I want to quote to this House the words of our distinguished Speaker in his opening address when he ascended that chair there, for I think they will go down in history and be a guide for every man who will ever be elected to the floor of this Chamber or any other legislative chamber. In the course of his remarks he said:

No man is fit to be a lawgiver for a mighty people who yields to the demands and the solicitations of the few having access to his ear, but is forgetful of that vast multitude who may never hear his voice or look into his face.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, what has been the argument presented? As I said before, there seems to be chaos on that side of the House. We have just heard a gentleman giving us the nicest kind of compliments about this bill, and we certainly thank him for the compliments. What do they say when they are met with arguments? They say that the Wilson bill caused the panic of 1893. Why, I remember away back in 1892, and I believe I was a boy only 13 years old at that time, when two men had a quarrel about this tariff question. I listened to them, and finally when the man who was a Democrat prevailed in the argument, when his argument of the right could not be assailed, the other fellow said, "Well, who put down the rebellion anyway?" And since 1893 it has been "Who caused the panic of 1893?" I have heard that panic talk from that side of the House at this late day. I heard it the other day from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who made that woolly, ragged speech, who said that the panic of 1893 was caused by the Wilson-Gorman bill, which went into effect in August, 1894. Very good reasoning, was it not? Mr. Chairman, right in this connection I want to insert in my remarks a quotation to show the number of failures in this country between 1890 and 1893, to show that the panic of 1893 was not caused by the Wilson-Gorman bill, and could not have been caused by that bill, because it did not go into effect until August 27, 1894. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to show that the panic of 1893 happened during the time when the McKinley tariff bill was in operation [applause on the Democratic side], a tariff bill to which all the high priests of protection have been pointing ever since.

It may not be out of place to point out that when the Democratic administration surrendered the reins of government March 4, 1889, there was in the Federal Treasury the largest surplus in history. When the Republican Party went out of power March 4, 1893, there was a large deficit, and the incoming administration was finally persuaded to make the bond issues which its Republican predecessor had at one time thought to be necessary, but had skillfully avoided.

The claim that the business disasters of the period referred to were due to the popular fear of tariff legislation to be enacted by Democrats is, as has been said, met by the fact that this panic began two years prior to the presidential election day of 1892. The following will serve as reminders on this point:

November 11, 1890, the reports showed financial distress in New York. The New York Clearing House Association voted its certificates to banks in need of assistance.

The Boston Clearing House Association did the same thing November 17. Barker Bros. & Co., big bankers in Philadelphia, suspended at that time, with liabilities placed at $5,000,000.

November 19, 1890, there was a run on the Citizens' Savings Bank of New York, and a receiver was appointed for the North River Bank.

November 22, 1890, the United Rolling Stock Co. of Chicago assigned, with liabilities at $6,851,000.

November 28, 1890, B. K. Jamieson & Co., the Philadelphia bankers, failed, with liabilities at $2,000,000.

December 6, 1890, the Oliver Iron & Steel Mills, of Pittsburg, shut down, discharging 2,000 employees. On the same date the cotton firm of Myer & Co., of New Orleans, failed, with liabilities at $2,000,000.

January 3, 1891, the Scottdale Rolling Mills & Pike Works and the Charlotte Furnace & Coke Works, in Pennsylvania, closed, throwing 10,000 employees out of work.

January 18, 1891, the American National Bank at Kansas City suspended, with liabilities at $2,250,000.

May 8, 1891, the Spring Garden National Bank at Philadelphia closed its doors, and the Pennsylvania Safe Deposit & Trust Co. made an assignment.

The Homestead strike and other strikes during 1892, and prior to election day, are well remembered by the people.

The record discloses that the first indications of the so-called panic of 1893 were given November 11, 1890, a little more than 30 days after the McKinley tariff bill became a law. From that date the panic raged, and while its effects were felt for several years, it reached its worst stage in 1893 and during the early days of 1894, during all of which time the Republican tariff law was in effect.

They do not say anything about the panic of 1907; Oh, they do not say anything about that. I did not hear it mentioned at all. What did they do in 1907? Did they pay labor? Why, they paid it with shinplaster certificates, the clearing-house shinplasters, that were not worth a penny. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in these arguments about hard times and prosperity, and I would not use them if the Republicans did not. The people have repudiated that kind of argument. It is no argument at all. The people know better, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] thought he was making an awful argument when he said that the putting of rags on the free list in the Wilson bill was in anticipation of the panic of 1893. Rags! Mr. Chairman, the panic of 1893, I repeat, was on before the Wilson-Gorman bill went into effect, and I ask any denial of that statement on the floor of this or on the floor of any legislative body. So you had better not talk about it. I do not believe it is any argument at all. Did you hear Democrats accusing Republicans of causing the panic of 1907? Why, they would not think of making such an argument. I do not believe in using such a hodgepodge of an argument. It amounts to nothing. It is evidence that ought to be excluded, because it is immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota spoke the other day about caucuses. I was very much interested in the subject of caucuses and his explanation of an ideal government, and I want to say amen, amen, to everything he read. But I believe such a form of government as he described would probably work well in heaven, where everything is ideal. He went on and condemned the caucus, and after he had condemned the caucus he threw his manuscript aside and then went on extemporaneously, and said that a party conference was a good thing. I want to state to the gentleman from Minnesota that the party conference he described is a Democratic caucus. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, what those gentlemen have been subjected to in a Republican caucus? It must have been some form of a third degree, because they object so much to a Republican caucus, and I invite all of those gentlemen to come to a Democratic caucus, a real genuine Democratic caucus, a real genuine party conference, and you will find there the most democratic men that you ever met in your life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I also listened with great interest to my colleague, the Socialist gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER], and I was glad to hear the gentleman, who is the lone Representative of the Socialist Party, discuss the industrial conditions. We must admit that some of those industrial conditions which he pictured to us exist. I was glad that the gentleman of that party said that the protective tariff never protected labor. I noticed how the Republicans did not like that statement, but when he said that the trusts and monopolies were the result of our industrial evolution, and he was not opposed to monopoly, many of the gentlemen on that side bowed their heads in approval. My colleague stated, further, that we were moving toward the Government control of monopolies, and that that would surely come. I can not agree to such a system of government. I can never subscribe to the Government control of everything. If we adopt that theory, where would we be going to? We would drift back to the old idea of feudalism. The Government would be a feudal lord, and there would be minor lords all around, and we would be slaves under the gentleman's theory of government. My colleague from Wisconsin would undoubtedly be one of the lords. I believe in the party that represents individualism, the party that represents equal opportunity to all, and that is the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I hope that all men will realize that the Democratic Party has always stood for individualism, for equal opportunity to all, for the liberty of all, for equal rights to all and special privileges to none. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the people to-day are demanding great reforms. They are demanding the initiative; they are demanding the referendum and the recall. They were demanding primary elections, and they got that reform. Why? Why are the people demanding these reforms? Not because our form of government is not good; not because a representative democracy is a bad form of government; not because the Constitution has outlived its usefulness, as my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] would claim. Not for those reasons, but because our Government has not been well administered; because our Government has not been truly representative of the people.

The people have simply learned what is going on. Instead of being ignorant of their Government and incapable of self-government, they are enlightened; they know what their Government should be, and they know how to take charge of it. They know how it has been perverted from what it was intended to be. They have had their ear to the ground; they have watched things. They have seen their rights disregarded; they have seen their public servants disregard their will with impunity. They have witnessed bold violations of platform pledges of parties and representatives. They have seen and heard corruption in high places; they have witnessed graft, dishonesty, and boodling in public office. They have been defrauded of natural resources, valuable rights, and franchises. They have witnessed the concentration of wealth; they have watched the growth of trusts and monopolies; they have seen millionaires grow like mushrooms in a fortnight; they have witnessed the enrichment of the few at the expense of the many. Is it any wonder that the people are calling a halt? Is it any wonder that they want to restore the Government where it belongs?

Benjamin Franklin, at the time the draft of the Constitution was finished, said: "There is no form of government but what may be a blessing if it is well administered." I believe with him. I believe that any government, if it is administered in the interest of the people, is a good government. Why, an absolute monarchy was a good government as long as the absolute monarch served well the people. It was when he abused his power, when he interfered with the individual rights of his subjects, that the people arose and demanded constitutions, and we had a constitutional monarchy. And then when there was a further abuse of power in constitutional monarchies, when the monarchs began to trespass on the power of the legislative bodies, the people turned their eyes to the republic.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the American Government is the best Government on the face of the earth. [Applause.] And I believe the initiative, the referendum, and the recall are only demanded for the purpose of administering this Government well. And when we, as representatives of the people, prove that we are legislating here equally for all the people, and not listening to the whisperings of the special interests, they will say: "Well done, faithful servants; you have served us; and we do not care to recall you; we do not care to initiate any legislation, because you passed such as we wanted; we do not care to have you refer it to us, because we have been served." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If every department of this Government is administered as it should be administered; if the legislative powers of this Government, the executive, and the judicial are administered under the Constitution as they were intended to be administered, we need have no fear of the initiative, referendum, or recall, or anything else, because we will be serving the people and serving them well. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 17, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, in whom we live and move and have our being, inspire us, we beseech Thee, with new devotion to those high and holy principles illustrated in the life and character of Thy Son Jesus Christ, that we may prove ourselves worthy of the dignity bestowed upon us as rational beings, sons of the living God, destined to immortal life, "for I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11019, a bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, according to my judgment, the greatest utterances on the question of tariff were from a Mississippian, Robert J. Walker, at one time Secretary of the Treasury. It appears to me that in the documents that he wrote during that time there were announced principles along the line of tariff regulation and tariff law that were just, reasonable, and right.

But we are not to-day to discuss the question of free trade. Speaking for myself alone, I believe most implicitly and most strongly in those principles; but for a long period of years, indeed from the beginning of this Nation, there has been pursued a certain policy with reference to the raising of revenue. We raise revenue to defray the expenses of this Government by laying imposts on articles that are imported into this country. So I shall not discuss the question of free trade at this time, but shall try to confine my remarks to the policy that has been adopted to these two propositions, namely, Shall we have a high protective tariff, or shall we have a tariff for revenue only?

Mr. Chairman, there has been much criticism with reference to the pending bill, criticism because the proposed duties are not high enough, criticism from another source because they are too high.

The reason given for placing the duties on raw wool and the manufactured products is that it is necessary to do so in order to raise revenue. I shall not discuss this phase of the question.

I favor the bill for another reason. The people have had to bear a great burden of taxation; they have cried out for relief and are entitled to it. This burden has been placed upon them by the protective tariff. The question arises, How shall they obtain it?

In considering this matter we must deal with conditions, not theories. We are confronted with the fact that the Republicans are in control of the Senate and the Presidency. It is vain, even unreasonable, to expect that a party that has been so long wedded to a policy, though a false one—that Ephraim-like has been so long joined to its idol, protection—could be induced within the short space of a few months to renounce that policy and accept the principles of Democracy along the lines of the tariff.

No matter how strongly we favor putting wool on the free list; no matter how much we favor a further reduction on the manufactured products, we must act in the light of the fact that it is not at the present time within the power of the Democratic Party to write such a tariff bill as it really favors.

It may be vain to indulge the hope that this bill will pass a Republican Senate, but I really indulge that hope, not because I believe the Republican Party wants to give the people the relief they ought to have, but because that party, or enough of its official members, have seen a great light; they have heard a great, wild roar of indignation and discontent. I believe that they will respond to it, although very unwillingly.

The President has denounced Schedule K as absolutely indefensible. This places his party in an awkward attitude to defend the woolen schedule.

Again, that party has a bitter recollection of the election last fall. Every time their minds revert to that event they see their party weighted down with broken promises, burdened with unjust and iniquitous laws, made unsightly by the canker of greed and graft, having the contempt and disgust of an outraged and indignant people, wrecked upon the rocks of their own wrongdoings.

Doubtless this memory haunts them day and night. If they have learned wisdom of experience they will grant some measure of relief to the people and pass this bill.

In the light of these conditions I believe that good sense dictated that we, as Democrats, offer a bill that at least has a chance to pass, instead of offering one that had absolutely no chance to become a law.

Do we surrender any principle when we offer and vote for a bill that is the best we can get, simply because we honestly believe that the people are entitled to greater relief? I think not. A half loaf is better than no bread at all, according to the old adage.

If this bill becomes a law it will save millions of dollars for the people; therefore I favor it, hoping for greater relief later on.

Mr. Chairman, after hearing the debates on the tariff I have reached the conclusion that protection is either "the loveliest and most fruitful mother of the wealth of a nation, or it is an imposter and swindler, distinguished from other swindlers mainly by the vast scale of its operation."

I would place it in the latter class. There has been more deceit, more fraud, more injustice, perpetrated in the name of protection against the people of the Nation than in any other name. Whenever you take money out of the pocket of one man and put it into the pocket of another man, a great wrong is done to the first one. That is exactly what is done under tariff legislation enacted by the Republican Party.

A certain class comes before the committee of this House and says, "We can not prosper, we can not make money unless you take money from somebody else and take the property that others have toiled for and give it to us." There can be no right or justice in anything of that kind.

The protective tariff is simply robbery perpetrated by law. It enables the producer to exact from the consumer a price he would not otherwise get. It interferes with the natural law of distribution, and this should never be done, except so far as fiscal necessity may require.

Every protective duty causes the consumer to pay a tax which does not go into the Treasury of the Government, but merely aids or enriches certain individuals or corporations.

This is one of the greatest evils of the tariff. It is estimated that where $1 of revenue is collected for the Government under the present law from $7 to $10 goes into the pockets of the manufacturers of this country. The Government has no right to engage in the business of enriching certain classes of its citizenship.

Mr. Cooley, in his writings on constitutional law, says:

> Where a tax is avowedly laid for a private purpose, it is illegal and void. Constitutionally, a tax can have no other basis than the raising of revenue for public purposes, and whatever governmental exaction has not this basis is tyrannical and unlawful. A tax on imposts, therefore, the purpose of which is not to raise revenue, but to discourage and indirectly prohibit some particular impost for the benefit of some home manufacturer, may well be questioned as being colorable, and therefore not warranted by constitutional principles.

A protective tariff breaches this great principle of constitutional law, because the very purpose of protection, as set out in the Republican platform, is to compensate the manufacturer for the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad and to guarantee to him a reasonable profit on his investments.

The argument is made that it is right to do this because it builds up a home market, that it gives employment to the people, that it causes higher wages.

I was struck by the remark made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] a few days ago, when he said that there was always free trade among labor. What protection does labor have? What protection has the Republican Party given to labor in this country by the laws that it has enacted? The doors are thrown wide open, or almost so, and we have vast hordes coming in day by day and week by week. Do they not compete with American labor? Is not a large percentage of the immigration of this country what has been termed "cheap foreign labor"? Are not native American citizens required to compete with the very kind of labor that you are supposed to be protecting the manufacturers against? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I favor more stringent immigration laws. Why, Mr. Chairman, I believe that more than a million immigrants came into this country last year; and yet, as I said, there is absolutely no protection to our labor against this foreign labor. It is the man of wealth, the man of capital, the manufacturer, who has all this protection.

Many false arguments are made with reference to the reason for giving protection to the manufacturers. It is said that wages are much higher in this country than in foreign lands. When you come to consider the cost of production there is more to be considered than simply the amount of the daily wage. I remember that a great Republican, James G. Blaine, had something to say along this line.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. KOPP. Before the gentleman leaves that question——

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I am not going to leave the question just yet.

Mr. KOPP (continuing). I am interested to know what different protection was given the laboring man by legislation relative to immigration by the Democratic Party during the years it was in power than has been given by the Republican Party since that time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I do not know that there was any very great difference in the kind of legislation enacted during this period, but I know this——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me, I think it could be well said that during the time that the Democrats were in power, and in the early history of our Government, the class of immigrants coming to this country was quite different to those encouraged by the manufacturers of the country to-day, who take the place of American labor.

Mr. KOPP. Does the gentleman from Illinois contend that the class of immigrants coming to this country from 1890 to 1895 was materially different from the class of immigrants coming to-day?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will state to the gentleman that in the early history of our country, when it was building up, we had not those manufacturers who were so desirous of securing cheap foreign labor, but it finally became so bad that Congress was compelled to pass a law stopping the contracting for labor in foreign countries that grew up under a Republican administration.

Mr. KOPP. The gentleman does not contend that the period from 1890 to 1895 was in the early history of our country before our manufactures had developed, does he?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. No, I do not, but I am simply speaking of the conditions when the Democrats had absolute sway in the early history of our country that the gentleman was speaking about, and not labor conditions.

Mr. KOPP. The point I am making is, that the last time the Democratic Party was in power the class of immigration was just the same as now, and that no attempt was made by that party to improve these conditions, and so the members of that party are estopped from attacking the Republican Party for failing to do what they failed to do.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I think the Democratic Party was more careful as to the class of immigrants that came into this country during the time that they were in power than the Republicans were before that or since.

Mr. KOPP. Was there any different law on the statute books?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I think the administration of the law was better.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I will state further, that as was well said by one of our colleagues of Mississippi some time ago, the Democratic Party was only in power for a very short time—in absolute control of the Government—while the Republican Party has had undisputed sway for many, many years, therefore they have had a greater opportunity to deal with these questions than has the Democratic Party. They have not remedied this great evil, although they have had every opportunity to do so. The Democratic Party when it was in power had so many wrongs to remedy that it could not remedy them all.

Mr. KOPP. One moment, if the gentleman will pardon me. I do not want to be misunderstood. I believe one of the greatest needs to-day is an amendment to the immigration law. I agree heartily with those who say that we should keep out a great many immigrants who are coming in. The only point I was attempting to establish by my query was that inasmuch as the Democratic Party had failed, even in attempting to modify immigration laws while they had an opportunity, that they are estopped now from attacking us because we have failed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. If we get the opportunity, I think we will make the effort to remedy this great evil. I agree that if there is one evil that ought to be remedied it is the evil attaching to the immigration law.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. For a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. More foreigners are coming into the United States now in one year than came in during the whole period from 1892 to 1897. More foreigners have come into the United States in the last 14 years under the reign of the Republican Party than came prior to that time in 60 years. The character of the immigrants that came in during the Cleveland administration was different from that of many who are coming in now. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], chairman of the Committee on Immigration, made a visit to Sicily two or three years ago, and he asked, "What has become of the bandits, the awful criminals that we used to read about?" And he was told by natives that they had all gone to America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted I was discussing the question of the cost of production, and had remarked that there was more to be considered in this matter than simply the amount of the daily wage. One great factor that should enter into consideration of the cost of production is the amount that will be produced by American labor and the amount that will be produced by foreign labor, and in speaking of this subject James G. Blaine had this to say:

> The actual labor cost of the American product is less, because the effectiveness of American labor is superior to that of the workingman of any other nation on earth.

The annual average output per laborer of the respective nationalities is as follows:

American	$2,450
Canadian	1,455
Australian	900
French	640
English	556
German	460

Thus it will be seen that, as the American laborer is more productive than any other, he is entitled to much higher wages.

It is argued in favor of protective tariff that it gives a better market for the products of this country. It may be true that a higher price may be obtained for our products because of the fact, but it is also true that the tariff requires the man who gains this higher price to pay much more for what he has to buy, and in the end the loss is greater than the gain.

Really it amounts to this: That the man who has something to sell must contribute out of his own pocket a part of the price of his own product. To illustrate: Suppose a man is raising hogs for the market, and that his product is sold to a man who is working in a factory. It will be said that the laborer is able to pay a better price for the products of the farm, because of the higher wage given him by virtue of the tariff. As the farmer has to pay a tariff on the very article that contributes to the wage of the laborer, does he not, in reality, help to pay for the very hog that he has raised?

In truth, the tariff is for the benefit of the manufacturers. They get a much larger proportion of the protection granted to the industry than does the laborer who engages in it; and this is the real purpose of the tariff.

Mr. Chairman, the protective tariff proceeds upon an erroneous idea. It is not the function of government to legislate wealth into existence, and it can not do so.

During last session of Congress I heard the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] use this language:

> However unfashionable it may be, my political faith is that of men who know that the thing called wealth is a social, not a political product; that this wealth is born of brawn of muscle, skill of hand, and vigil of brain, not of the roll calls of Congress; that the thing called industrial prosperity is a social, not a political product; that such prosperity is born of the energy and genius of man applied to the bounties of nature and not of the cunning and greed and craft of men applied to the powers of government. The power of government is the power to take, not the power to make; the power to tax is the power to transfer, not the power to produce. Our Government has no reserve fund or power out of which to grant privileges. It can grant privileges only by carving them out of the body of common rights. The Government, having no profits to bestow, the reasonable profit the law is to assure must be sponged from the victims the law makes.

Any scheme of taxation is unjust that is not levied upon the rich and the poor according to their ability to pay it. The protective tariff places the burden unequally. The true, the equitable, rule of taxation is to determine the actual needs of the Government when honestly and economically administered and then to so levy taxes that the burdens of government may be borne by the people in equal proportions, letting wealth contribute its just share.

The old theory of the tariff was that it was framed to raise revenue and granted incidental protection. The new theory seems to be that the tariff is framed for protection to the manufacturer with incidental revenue to the Government.

Under this system there have grown up great private monopolies and trusts. It is absolutely indefensible that they should be assisted by law through a protective tariff. It is a crime against the American people. They control the market, destroy competition, fix the price of raw and finished products, and to a very large extent regulate the price paid for labor.

Many of these great trusts carry a large amount of watered stock in their capitalization. Indeed, some of them have a larger amount of watered stock than paid-in capital, and yet the national platform of the Republican Party guaranteed to them a reasonable profit on their entire capital stock.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] stated that the Ways and Means Committee, before passing the Payne-Aldrich bill, heard evidence for several months; that they went thoroughly into this matter, investigating the questions involved. He admitted that that law was not perfect, because he claimed that no tariff bill ever written was perfect. That is true, and will always be true, so long as we follow up the system that has been followed so long in the United States, and especially will it be true so long as the Republican Party carries out its policy of protection to the great manufacturing industries. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He stated that this bill met unmerited and unintelligent abuse at the hands of the people. He stated further that the pending bill is absolutely indefensible from any standpoint whatever.

Let us investigate some details of the Payne-Aldrich bill and compare them with the present bill.

We find that cloths, woolen and worsted, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, under the Payne bill are taxed at an equivalent ad valorem of 134 per cent. The same articles, valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 70 cents per pound, are taxed 119 per cent; valued at more than 70 cents per pound, 94 per cent. The articles under the present bill carry an ad valorem of only 40 per cent.

Blankets valued at not more than 40 cents per pound carry an equivalent ad valorem of 107 per cent. To show that this tax is absolutely prohibitory and placed that high for the specific purpose of giving a high rate of protection to the manufacturers, we have only to cite that during the year 1907 there was only $316 worth imported into this country.

Blankets 3 yards in length carried an equivalent ad valorem of 165 per cent, and only $40 worth was imported. Under the proposed bill these articles carry an ad valorem of 30 per cent.

Flannel for underwear valued at not more than 40 cents per pound is taxed 143 per cent, while under this bill they are taxed 30 per cent and 45 per cent, according to value per pound.

Flannels valued from 40 to 50 cents per pound carry an ad valorem of 101 per cent, and there was only $128 worth imported; valued at 50 to 70 cents per pound were taxed 105 per cent, and the importations amounted to $111.

Dress goods, mixed, cotton and wool, valued at 15 cents per square yard carried a tax of 106 per cent. I notice that these goods, the average import price of which is 13½ cents per yard, are classed by the Republican tariff bill as luxuries. A woman's dress which would cost from $1.25 to $1.50 is thought by that party to be a luxury. They force the women purchasing the same to pay more than double what it is really worth, yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in the face of the fact that he voted for that tax, had a great deal of criticism to make of this bill because a tax of 45 per cent is charged. There was much of inconsistency in his argument, because it is readily seen that under this bill there will be considerable saving on each article purchased.

Wearing apparel, cloaks, jackets, and other outside garments for women and children are taxed 80 per cent under the present law, while we propose to tax them just half that amount.

Under the Payne bill men's hats are taxed 86 per cent, and shawls valued at $1.25 and above are classed as luxuries and taxed at 92 per cent.

Shirts, vests, union suits, sweaters, pants, and so forth, manufactured of cotton goods and valued at more than $5 per dozen are taxed more than 64 per cent. Under the Payne bill these articles are classed as luxuries. Think of it. The poor man buying a pair of pants, a sweater, or shirt valued at more than $5 per dozen is charged by this Republican Party with the purchase of luxuries. Has it come to pass in this great country of ours that it is a luxury for a man to wear cheap garments of that kind? Does it not show that the Republican Party has absolutely no regard for the poor of the land, but that their whole interest is centered in the manufactures and protected interests of this country? Does it lie in the mouth of any man who was guilty of helping perpetrate such a fraud, such an iniquity as the Payne-Aldrich bill, to criticize the present bill, which reduces the burden of taxation so much?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] stated that the committee that reported the Payne bill spent months in gathering the testimony upon which to base the bill. Who was it, in the main, that appeared before the committee and told them what ought to be written into the laws of the land?

They were men who were very much interested, who had a great financial interest at stake. As Senator Sherman once said, referring to tariff legislation, an important class—the consumer—was not consulted. That the tariff laws enacted by the Republican Party have been written in the interest of certain classes, instead of the great body of the people, is shown by the remarks of a member of that party, Senator Dolliver. He said, after the Payne bill becomes a law, that—

> Veteran experts are given the right to fix our laws. Behind nearly every veteran expert that we have had fluttering around here in recent years is the veteran manager of the enterprise that is to be fixed.

Again he said:

> The most important business of the American people has come down to the bargain counter, and men are authorized to say, "This is the citadel of protection; if any of you have constituents that want anything, come here; we are the dispensing power; support what we want, and take anything that you think you need."

In reading the testimony taken during the hearing referred to by the gentleman, I could not help but exclaim to myself that these men who were seeking protection at the hands of the Government are the miserable product of human greed and commercialism, seeking to build up their own interests at the expense of the men who labor and toil. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican Party has carried the idea of protection into the free list. Of the 600 articles on that list, there are not a half dozen that enter into common use in every home in the land, but we find that millions upon millions of dollars' worth of various articles that are used by the great trusts and manufacturing industries in the land are permitted to come in free. This is simply another illustration of a desire of the Republican Party to foster the interest of a class.

That party has for a long period of time "fooled" the farmer by pretending to be his friend. A "sop" is thrown out to him occasionally in their tariff legislation. For instance, a pretense of protecting the farmer who raises corn is made by placing a duty of 15 cents per bushel on corn and 20 cents per bushel on corn meal imported into this country. To show that this is a mere sham and pretense, I have only to refer to the fact that last year the United States produced about three-fourths of all the corn raised in the entire world, and that nearly all of the great nations of the earth, except ours, were importers of corn, while we had corn to export. Of course, it follows that this duty was of absolutely no benefit to the farmers of our country.

The cotton farmers of the South have absolutely no protection. More than two-thirds of our cotton is exported to foreign countries. The Liverpool market regulates not only the price of cotton there, but the price of cotton here. It comes in competition with cotton produced by the cheapest labor in the world—the coolie labor of India. This great product contributes very largely to make the balance of trade in our favor, yet the men who produce this staple get absolutely no protection, but are required to bear very heavy burdens both by way of taxation and by way of enforced contribution to the pockets of the manufacturers.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it stated very frequently during this debate that if the proposed bill becomes a law the sheep industry in this country will be destroyed, and reference has been made time after time to the fact that the sheep industry was almost destroyed by the Wilson bill.

By reference to the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1910, I find that in 1893 there were 47,000,000 sheep in the United States, and in 1897 there were 36,000,000, a reduction of over 11,000,000 during the time the Democratic Party was in power.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] the other day, in asking a question of some gentleman on this side, had this to say: "Do you not believe that the tariff was one of the elements that caused this great reduction in the number of sheep in the United States during that period?"

Mr. Chairman, that might reasonably be contended if there was not evidence that during the same period of time in Australia, and, indeed, all over the world, there was a great reduction in the number of sheep during that same period. Did the American tariff affect the sheep outside of the United States? Not at all.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that tariffs do not make panics; that they do not prevent panics; and that they do not cause sheep to grow or to die. Let us refer to a period during a Republican administration, and see what the condition of the sheep industry was during that time.

In 1903 when the Republicans were in power and the Dingley bill was in effect there were 63,000,000 sheep in the United States. Two years later, in 1905, when this same party was in power and the same Dingley bill was the law of the land, we find that there was only 45,000,000 sheep in the United States, a reduction of 18,000,000 in three years. What caused that? Was it the tariff? If the tariff did not cause that reduction, which was much larger than during the four years of Democratic administration, why should we charge the great reduction from 1893 to 1897 to the Wilson bill? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I find by reference to Table 40, in the report of the committee, that in 1890 the per capita consumption of wool in the United States was 9.24 pounds, and in 1910 it was only 7.11 pounds.

It has been argued that by reducing the duty on raw wool there would come into our country about 200,000,000 pounds from other countries, and that because of this the sheep industry of the United States would be destroyed.

Let me suggest that if the people had not been so burdened by taxation, had not been so shamefully required to contribute to the great wealth of certain manufacturers; if they had been permitted to pay simply a just and reasonable amount toward the revenue of the Government, and had been permitted to keep the balance of the fruits of their labor, that they would have been able to purchase the same amount of woolen clothes in 1910 as they were in 1890.

And further, that if relieved of these unjust, unnecessary, and iniquitous burdens that they will again be able to purchase the same amount as formerly, and we find by multiplying the number of our population by 2.13, the difference between the amount per capita, used during the years referred to, that it will require about 195,000,000 pounds of wool more than was used last year. This is almost the identical amount that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says would come into the country, and thereby destroy the sheep industry.

Every time an effort is made to give relief to the people the cry goes up from the Republican Party that the financial interests of the Nation are about to be destroyed. The advocates of protection claim for it that it is the cause of our great national prosperity, of our wonderful advancement in national wealth.

Everything good is placed to the credit of protection; all the reverses are charged up to the Democratic Party. The fertility of our soil, the bounties of nature, the great stores of natural wealth in the bowels of the earth, the industry and intelligence of our people, art, science, and inventive genius are all overlooked by the Republican Party when they come to consider the causes of the progress and wealth of the United States.

Frequent reference has been made to the Walker tariff during this debate. There has been much criticism by Republican speakers of that tariff. To show that the charge that that measure was harmful to our Nation is unfounded I cite Mr. Taussig, a writer on tariff history. He says:

> There is no doubt that the period from 1846 to 1860 was a time of great material prosperity, interrupted but not checked by the crisis of 1857. The moderate tariff undoubtedly was one of the elements that contributed to the welfare. The crisis of 1857 was an unusually simple case of active speculation, overbanking, panic, and depression, and it requires the exercise of great ingenuity to connect it in any way with the tariff act. When the tariff act of 1846 was passed the protectionists predicted disaster, but disaster did not come.

The increase in our national wealth between 1850 and 1860 under a Democratic tariff measure was equivalent to 126 per cent, a much greater increase than is shown at any time since that under Republican administration.

Mr. Chairman, the special interests have been protected too long; the farmer, the laboring man, the real producer of wealth in this country should be given a chance. The farmer is not here asking that a tax be levied upon anyone for his benefit, but he simply asks that no unnecessary burdens be placed upon him, and that he be not required to create wealth for the benefit of any particular class.

The Republican platform, as I have said, guarantees to the producer—which really means the manufacturer—a reasonable profit upon his investments. What other class in this country has any such guaranty?

What benefits have the farmers received from the tariff? The price of his cotton and his wheat is fixed by a foreign market, yet almost every article that he purchases bears a tax, and in most instances a very heavy tax. He has no guaranty from the Government of any "reasonable profit." He must trust himself to the forces of nature and the help of a beneficient Providence.

He goes forth in the morning tilling his ground and sowing his seed with a silent prayer in his heart that those forces of nature and that Providence will be kind to him, will smile upon him, and that his harvest will be plenteous and bountiful.

Instead of looking to the tariff for help, he must take the risk of the soil responding to cultivation, of the sunshine and rain coming in due season so as to cause an abundant yield. If the withering blast, the long-continued drought, or any pest shall destroy his crop; if the earth shall refuse its accustomed yield; if sickness or misfortune shall visit him and impair his ability to labor during the crop season, the Government throws no fostering care around him. All he can do is to await another season, ever hoping that the future will deal more kindly with him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HENRY of Texas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 23. An act to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW.;

S. 238. An act to authorize the extension of Lamont Street NW., in the District of Columbia;

S. 1524. An act to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River, in western Shawnee County, or in Wabaunsee County, in the State of Kansas;

S. 2052. An act relating to the removal of the North Point light station, Wisconsin, to another site;

S. 2224. An act to amend an act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, approved June 1, 1910; and

S. 2532. An act providing for an increase of salary for the collector of customs for the district of Montana and Idaho.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MAYS].

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to apologize to this House for the time that I have taken up in Congress heretofore in debate upon this floor. I have gone all the gaits of a Congressman since I came to Washington as a member of this body, except, perhaps, the running canter of the daily debaters upon this floor, and I do not say this, Mr. Chairman, in any sense of criticism of the members of that order, for I commend them not alone for their ability, but their industry, their interest in and their devotion to public affairs; and my remarks do not apply to one side of this House alone, but to both sides; and I believe that that order is of as much value to this great body of men as a picket line to a great army, and their uses much the same—that neither be taken unawares. In the beginning, Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the leader of the majority upon this floor for the few minutes' time given me to make a speech, incidentally upon the tariff bill, and I want to commend him for his able leadership upon this floor and declare that, in my opinion, he ranks high up with the great men who have held sway as leaders in this body since the foundation of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I want to say to the Democratic people throughout the United States that if they are as harmonious on all great questions of public welfare as the Members of this body and as earnestly desire Democratic supremacy there will be no question of the election of a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President in 1912. [Applause on the Democratic side.] One of the troubles heretofore with the Democratic Party against its success has been the multiplicity of its leaders. It has been an army of generals and colonels, each general with his ideas of the campaign. Consequently we exhausted ourselves fighting in our own ranks; but to-day we find the Democratic Party here in this House—and the eyes of the country are upon it—a unit for the cause of good government; and in my opinion no man in the Union is entitled to greater credit for it than the great man who is Speaker of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if this Democratic Congress carries out its promises to the people, makes good to them, the man who beats CHAMP CLARK for the Presidency in 1912 will know that he has been in a race. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When I came to Congress two years ago it was at the call of the President in extra session to revise the tariff bill. So objectionable had the Dingley law become to the people of the United States that a Republican President deemed it wise, imperative upon him, to call an extra session of Congress to revise the tariff downward, as he had promised on the stump. The session was called, and after five months of strenuous debate upon this floor, with every department of the Government in the hands of the Republican Party, the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was passed, much to the dissatisfaction of all the people, as no reduction had been made, and the Republican Party's promises to the people had been broken. Yet a Republican President signed that bill and afterwards declared that it was the best tariff bill ever made by the Republican Party.

And what do we find to-day? We find that same Republican President calling an extra session of Congress here to relieve an outraged people, suffering from the beneficence of the Payne tariff bill. We find as a result of that bill here a Democratic House, by a large majority, and we find in the White House a Republican President appealing to a Democratic House and the Democratic Members in the Senate to relieve the people from the high cost of living, from the outrageous taxes placed upon them by his own party. Was there ever such a spectacle before in the history of this country, a Republican President praying to be delivered from his Republican friends? [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the beginning of this Government the tariff was used for the purpose of raising revenue for the expenses of the Government. What do we find to-day? That it is the great issue, dividing the two great parties of our country. The Republican Party championing a tariff for a specific protection and not for the protection of the people, from whom the revenue is derived, but for the purpose of protecting the few against the many. Thereby creating great trusts and monopolies on the plea of protecting infant industries that to-day have become giants on account of the great favors received at the hand of the Republican Party and are a fast-growing menace to our Republican form of Government. On the other hand, we find the Democratic Party still clinging to the old doctrine that taxes should be taken from the people only for the running expenses of the Government, economically administered.

The people of the United States have grown tired of false promises and of the reckless extravagances of the Republican Party. See the change—from a majority of 47 in the last House on the Republican side to 63 majority on this side in the present House—and, my friends, this is not a Democratic exaggeration, but is an actual fact, and it is enough to carry consternation to the hearts of the strongest standpatters in the Republican Party. It must convince you Members on that side of the Chamber that something has happened to the Republican Party. Especially when you see the former head of the House down on the floor and its brains scattered from Minnesota to Maine. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The people have turned to the Democratic Party for relief on account of the promise by it of reform in every line and in every department of this Government. The first promise was to do away with Cannonism, to take away the czarlike power of the Speaker of the House to stifle or control all legislation.

This has been done by taking away the power of the Speaker to appoint the standing committees. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Then by curtailing the expenses of running the House alone we have saved the people $182,000 a year without lessening its efficiency in the least. Have also appointed committees to investigate every department of this Government, and from hearings before these committees you will be convinced that criminal extravagance and gross carelessness has been practiced in many departments. So much so that you will be fully warranted in turning the Republican Party from power as unworthy and recreant to the trust you have given them.

We have passed legislation without hesitation that the people of our country have been demanding for many years—that they be allowed the privilege of voting for the election of United States Senators, in order that they may send men to the Senate who will be their servants and not the servants of the great trusts and monopolies, and who will look to them—the people—for their election and not the trusts and corporations of this country. We have passed the publicity bill, which requires the making public campaign expenses before as well as after elections. We have passed the bill admitting New Mexico and Arizona as States without asking what their politics will be, Republican or Democratic, when admitted, carrying out our platform promises regardless of party advantage.

We have been called here by the President to pass the Canadian reciprocity bill, and without playing politics, we have done so, but I acknowledge, Mr. Chairman, that it is directly against the agricultural people of this country—the farmers—and why? Because, not a single line or syllable in it carries any encouragement or advantage to them; but every line in it is for somebody else's benefit. Its sole purpose is to cheapen the cost of living, to cheapen food products, and who produces food but the farmer. This measure is a great benefit to the dwellers in the city, the laborers in the mines, in the factories, and mills, and to the manufacturers especially, as it leaves him with protection on his wares, while to the farmer, all that it does, is to cheapen his products, while it does not make cheaper the articles that he must buy. But, Mr. Chairman, this Democratic House is not forgetful of the farmer man. It has also passed the farmers' free-list bill, that does give hope and encouragement to him, while it gives joy and relief to the multitude. While it takes away from the revenues of our Government only $10,000,000, it saves to the consumers of our country $300,000,000 annually. If these two bills become law, this Congress will go down as the greatest in the history of our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Will give new courage to our people, renew confidence in the Government, and will take away forever all talk of socialism and discontent. The people of this country are wiser to-day than ever before in the business of our Government; they are keeping pace with all questions that affect public welfare. They have formed opinions of their own, and one is, Mr. Chairman, that this mysterious tariff is simply a tax and that the ultimate consumer pays it, and to-day they are demanding that it be laid equally on all men, that there shall be no favored few taken into partnership with the Government and guaranteed, not only against loss on investment, but a reasonable profit on their business, at the expense of the many, whose backs are already bent with burdens too heavy to be borne. Our people know, Mr. Chairman, that we must raise revenue for the expenses of the Government, but they know also, Mr. Chairman, that a high-protective tariff does not make revenue for the Government, but does make great trusts and monopolies.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we have before us a bill reducing the tariff on wool—Schedule K—which even a Republican President has condemned and declared to be indefensible. It is enough for me to know that the people themselves have condemned it as the most outrageous and unjust tax ever heaped upon a people. Then, my Democratic friends, shall we reduce it? By all means. What excuse has the Republican Party for this iniquitous tax in the Payne bill, and can you look the people of this country in the face and even attempt to justify it? Is it not better that the lambs on a thousand hills go unherded for the lack of a shepherd and go unsheared for the lack of a reasonable profit and gambol in the sunshine forever than for the children of the multitude to lack clothing and covering sufficient to keep them warm and comfortable? Even take the Republican argument as true, that we need the prohibitive tariff to hold up this industry, which I deny, will you stake the life of an industry against the life and health of the people—and this a civilized country, a Christian Nation? God forbid. If so, then do you wonder that the question is asked:

> Is there no place on the face of the earth
> Where charity dwelleth; where virtue has birth;
> Where bosoms with kindness and mercy will heave
> When the poor and the wretched shall ask and receive?
> Is there no place at all where a knock from the poor
> Will bring a kind angel to open the door?

And the answer comes back:

> Go search the wide world wherever you can,
> There is no open door for the moneyless man.

I do not propose to discuss the woolen schedule in all of its phases. It is considered by the Republican Party to be full of mysteries. The Republican leader, Mr. MANN, vehemently declares that even the Democratic leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, whom he declares the best posted on this side, is ignorant of the woolen tariff. And Mr. MANN declares that even he himself does not know all about it. A wonderful confession for him to make—that there is anything under the sun that he does not know. And he also says that we ought to wait and get information from the able Tariff Board appointed for that purpose. With the highest regard for every member of that board—and I do not know who they are—but in the light of former investigations and reports, what are we to expect of them? Do men gather figs of thistles, or would a Republican take his ideas of the tariff from a Democratic board? Then how could you expect the Democrats to be guided by a Republican Tariff Board?

As for me, Mr. Chairman, I believe the Members of Congress, the representatives of the people, ought to make the tariff, and not delegate the power to any board. Why should this board be better fitted for the work, to gather information on the tariff, than Members of Congress and Senators who have been here for years, have helped to make tariff bills in the past, and who are still honored and trusted by their people? There are at least two schools of the tariff—tariff for specific protection and tariff for revenue with incidental protection. I have said, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican Party believes in a high protective tariff, while the Democratic Party in a tariff for revenue only. At last, whatever school has a majority on the Tariff Board, their idea will prevail. And a Republican President will appoint a Republican majority on the board and a Democratic President will appoint a Democratic majority. Consequently, the tariff will be left at last for Congress to settle.

Gen. Hancock, while a candidate for President, is quoted as saying that "the tariff is a local issue." Mr. Chairman, these are the words of a soldier, a man whose life has been given to war, and if followed to their last analysis would take us back to the Dark Ages, when every man was a law unto himself and every clan believed that it had the right to depredate upon its neighbor. Mr. Chairman, I had rather believe that we are our brother's keeper. In equal rights to all men, the greatest good to the greatest number. In union of States, of hearts, and of hands. That patriotism, like Old Glory, not only should, but does encircle us in its folds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the tariff question has been before the American people for years, almost since the foundation of the Government, and will remain an issue, as it necessarily must, as it is a question of taxation, until it is settled right and until it is placed on a proper principle of pure taxation for the support of the Government and not for the benefit of a favored class in this country.

In the campaign of 1908 the Republicans promised to revise the tariff, which led the people to believe that they intended to revise it downward, and the campaign speeches, especially in the West, led the voters to believe that the platform meant a downward revision. After the Dingley law had been in effect for 10 years the Republican Congress elected in 1908 undertook its revision in the special session of 1909. But when they had completed their work at the close of the extra session it was ascertained that the average rates were higher than the Dingley law, which had been in force since 1897. The people had asked for relief from high taxation upon the necessaries of life, and they were answered by a revision that continued the high, or higher, taxation as before. "They asked for bread and were given a stone; they asked for fish and were given a serpent." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the consideration of the Payne bill the Republicans for the first time admitted that the tariff was a tax and the people must pay it; many of them had contended before that time that if it were a tax, the foreigner paid it. The people of this country are too intelligent to believe the statement that high taxes are a benefit to them. If they are intelligent enough to maintain the free Government that our fathers established, they will not believe your party when you tell them they can be taxed into prosperity in a tariff bill such as you gave them in 1909.

There is an element of the Republican Party that believes that the promises made to the people should be kept, and they insisted that in the revision of the Dingley law duties should be reduced. After the Payne tariff bill had been in operation less than a year it became so apparent that prices had not been reduced on manufactured articles that there came a revolt of the American people at the ballot box in 1910. The friends of the Payne bill hoped that prosperity would return to the people after the passage of that iniquitous measure and that they would forget the broken promises, but the people had good memories and knew they had been fooled, so when the election of 1910 came they did not hesitate to put out of power the party that had betrayed them as the money changers were thrown from the temple.

A Democratic House was elected charged with the duty of revising the tariff in the interest of the people and not solely for its beneficiaries. In that election there were a number of questions which the people determined by their votes, but first and foremost that the tariff on the necessaries of life should be reduced below the rate of the Payne-Aldrich bill and the highest rate should be placed upon the luxuries. Articles in more common use, those bought by people of limited means, should be taxed as little as possible, that the cost of living might be reduced.

This Congress was called together in a special session by the President of the United States and asked to pass the reciprocity pact with Canada. No mention was made by the President of any other legislation. He failed to call attention to other abuses in the Payne bill, among which is the woolen schedule, which he has said was indefensible and ought to be revised. The Democratic majority agreed with the President in the treaty with Canada; but they go further and insist that the rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill should be reduced wherever that can be done in the interest of the people and the condition of the Treasury will permit. They have passed the free-list bill giving the people relief on many of the necessaries of life that are now controlled by the trusts of the country, which compel them to pay exorbitant prices as tribute to their greed and selfishness. The Democratic Party has always stood for the least possible taxation of the people for the needs of the Government, economically administered, believing that all forms of taxation are more or less burdensome upon the people, which should be kept as light as possible. The Democratic Party does not believe that any form of taxation increases the prosperity of the people. It believes the power of taxation should only be used for the support of the Government, and they do not object to taxation for that purpose, but they do object to being taxed for the benefit of the privileged few.

Democrats hold that it is wrong to tax one class of people for the benefit of another; they believe that every man should bear his just proportion of the expenses of government, but should not be asked to contribute for the benefit of a favored class of citizens and which does the Government no good and only enriches a few at the expense of the many. This system of protection has so permeated the body politic of our citizenship that protective laws of every form have been proposed to give one person the advantage over another. Men come to Congress and ask that laws be passed that will enable them to gather from their neighbors a portion of their earnings to enrich themselves.

The doctrine of "equal rights for all and special privileges for none" has been a Democratic doctrine for years, and it was no truer when it was uttered than it is at the present time. There never has been a better time in the history of the Government to put it into effect than now. Every individual citizen of our country should be given an equal chance with every other, and no law should be passed that has for its purpose to take from the earnings of the one and put them in the pocket of another without giving anything in return therefor. Out of this system of indirect taxation and the protection of a certain class of our country has also grown up the extravagant appropriations and the squandering of the people's money.

The people do not directly see the amount of taxes placed upon the individual articles which they are compelled to buy, and led to believe they are paying but little of the tax, and the object of protective interests has been to increase appropriations to such an extent that we must keep up this vicious system, under the plea that it is necessary to raise the revenue for the support of the Government. All appropriations should be considered as so much taxes upon the people, which must be paid by the producers of the country.

We can not escape the fact that the wealth is produced by the labor of the country, so that taxation must, in the last analysis, fall upon those who are the producers, those who create the wealth. It is not contended that tariff taxation should be removed entirely, but should only be levied with the idea of securing revenue for the Government. Years ago the idea of strict economy in public affairs was demanded of the people's representatives, but I am sorry to say in the last few years there has grown up in this country the idea that what was secured from the National Government is so much gained, to which we have not contributed our part; that the money taken from the great body of the people is returned to them in increased wages for their labor and better prices for their products, and that they are thus compensated for the wrong done them by this vicious system of taxation.

The majority on this side of the House has been intrusted with the responsibility of giving relief to the people from the burdens of taxation and to see that the expenses of the Government shall be reduced so that in the end the producers may be relieved of any unjust burden of taxation, and we are endeavoring to enact such laws as will give the relief that the people have asked for so long. No lobbyists, as was said of the last bill which passed Congress, have made this bill, but it has been made by the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In writing the bill under consideration the Ways and Means Committee have made a new departure. The Wool Trust was not consulted about the preparation of the bill. The framers of this bill had in mind two very important things which have not heretofore been considered—the lightening of the burdens of the consumers and the needs of the Government for revenue—hence, for the first time in a half century there is presented for the consideration of the American Congress a tariff bill not framed by so-called experts, the provisions of which are so plain and simple that the ordinary man or woman can understand them; a bill that should serve as a model for all future tariff legislation.

No agents of the Wool Trust have had access to the Committee on Ways and Means of this Congress that they might write the wool schedule. The committee has not asked, desired, or permitted them to do so.

The reprehensible methods which have hitherto obtained in the framing of the tariff bills were exposed by the late Senator Dolliver, of Iowa, in a speech in the United States Senate June 13, 1910. In that speech, one of the greatest ever delivered in the Senate, after showing how President Taft had been deceived and led to declare in a speech that the marked increases in the cotton duties provided for in the Payne law were applicable only to the high-priced cottons used by our people as luxuries, Senator Dolliver said:

No expert in the New York customhouse ever conceived this job I have referred to in this cotton schedule without the knowledge and consent of people standing behind the scenes. This very expert, who seems to have done the cotton business for us, is a veteran. He was just as helpful to you, my Democratic friends, in 1894 as he ever has been to us. He went home from the session that wrote the Wilson tariff law, boasting that he was the author of it. In the presence of one of the most distinguished citizens of Massachusetts, once connected with the Treasury Department, he stated with evident pride that he represented the textile industries of New England; that he had a contract with them that if he would drop his business as general appraiser he could go with the Textile Association with three times the salary of the office which the Government of the United States had confided to him. This veteran expert helped the Republican side of the committee in 1897 in the daytime and the Democratic side of the committee at night. He was a messenger between hostile camps. He certified to the Republican members of the committee that the sugar schedule did one thing and certified to the Democratic members that it did another. Instead of being an expert, he is an employee, and he has come down now for nearly a generation, dominating the proceedings of Congress, telling everybody what ought to be done, relieving even the great committees of their duty of investigation, writing these laws, and presenting to the American public a scandalous transaction such as I have exposed here to-day.

He also said:

If the committee does not have a care the public will get the impression that the tariff was revised by its most intimate friends, and the defense of the performance left to a total stranger. It is probable that those who engineered the tariff bill through the two Houses indulged the expectation that the exact nature of the transaction, while it was going on, could be hidden by the intricate movements of the machinery. But it may well be doubted whether the most buoyant lobbyist about the Capitol expected that the bungling work of Congress, when known and read of all men, could be surrounded by such an array of bogus statistics and high official sanctions, disseminated in speeches, in private letters, and by personal telegraphic messages throughout the country, as to very long conceal its actual operation from the American people. I do not propose that it shall remain the practice of the Republican Party if I can help it. I do not propose that the work which it brought here last summer shall be forced into the platform of the Republican Party and made a test of party fealty and party duty and party obligation. I propose that the job shall stand on its merits, and that the American people shall inquire to the full limit of their curiosity into every detail of the performance.

Again, I do not like this idea of having customhouse officials, to whom most of us have never been introduced, write our tariff laws. It hurts my pride to start with. Those who know us begin to see what a bubble this Senate business is; that the majority does not represent ideas—which my friend from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] so well says is the one potent thing there is in this world—that its debates have no significance, that when you want to get anything done you send out to the customhouse and get an expert—a veteran expert, if you can—to fix it up. Well, I am tired of it, and I will tell you why. The veteran experts that are given carte blanche to fix up our laws do not appeal to me as they used to. Behind nearly every veteran expert that we have had fluttering around here in recent years is the veteran manager of the enterprise that is to be fixed.

At another time he said:

The refusal of Aldrich to permit a proper revision of the wool and woolen schedule, with its excessive rates upon the necessities of life, the consumption value of which amounts to over $700,000,000 per year, was without doubt the worst feature of Payne-Aldrich tariff legislation.

Mr. CLARK, the Speaker of the House, in his speech on the conference report of the Payne-Aldrich bill, read an article from the Washington Times in reference to the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, page 4705, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 31, 1909, as follows:

With the closing days of the tariff session in sight and many of the schedules already agreed upon, scores of professional lobbyists are buying tickets for home, the hotels are feeling the effect of the exodus, the expressmen are doing a land-office business, and Members of Congress are feeling some confidence in being able to leave their committee rooms without being held up every 10 steps by some one who wants to talk tariff.

While there have been no scandals about the tariff lobbies, the lobbyists have done enough entertaining to occasion the remark that "a pleasant time was had."

Some of the lobbyists have been in Washington since the day the Ways and Means Committee held its first public hearing. Some of them have devoted their entire time to one particular schedule, while others have been working for half a dozen interests. A few of the lobbyists are lawyers, but most of them are either experts in a particular line or are former employees of the New York customhouse, thoroughly familiar with the workings of the tariff.

A former surveyor of the port of New York, who has been looking after schedules, has lived at the most expensive hotel in Washington since last November. His expense account has been unlimited, his personal living expenses have cost him nothing, and he has been getting big fees.

"When I return to New York," said this lobbyist, "I will be $30,000 richer than I was the day Congress began tinkering with the tariff. So far as I am personally concerned, I would like to see Congress called together next October. One or two more tariff revisions will fix me financially so that I will retire and live on my income."

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The free-hides lobby is generally admitted to be the biggest and most effective in Washington, but it is their boast that there is not a professional in their ranks, and that their expense accounts will not show a single purchase of champagne. The smallest lobby in town is that conducted by Lucius Littauer, the glove manufacturer, of Gloversville, N. Y., and a former Member of the House, who has given his personal attention to the increased duty on women's gloves.

The bill now under consideration to reduce the tariff upon wool and woolen clothing is intended to afford some relief to the people in one of the great necessaries of life. In the colder climates people are compelled to buy woolen clothing and woolen blankets to keep them warm, and, as a matter of health, it is essential they should supply themselves with such clothing; and I was surprised at my colleague, the distinguished minority leader, saying that it was contended by some that certain woolen clothing was unnecessary and unhealthful.

You must remember, also, that the coal miners of the country, of which there are many thousands in the State from which the minority leader comes, must buy wool clothing. They are compelled to buy it. Let us help these men by giving them cheaper necessaries of this kind. We believe that it is the duty of the Government to reduce taxation upon these articles to as low a figure as possible to do in view of the condition of the Treasury.

When we look at the statistics and history of sheep raising and woolgrowing in the United States some peculiar facts are brought to our view. It has been claimed by those who believe in a high tariff upon wool and woolen goods that it is of great benefit to the woolgrower and the wool manufacturer of the country. There is no doubt that, so far as the manufacturer is concerned, it has been of great advantage to him, as under this system the tariff has been prohibitive. When an argument is made upon the wool question it is pointed out that the decrease in the number and price of sheep and price of wool under the Wilson bill is an argument why a high tariff ought to be retained.

The Republicans point to the era of depression from 1893 to 1897 as the result of the Wilson bill, not recognizing the fact that the depression of that period began before the Democrats gained power and had begun to disappear before they went out of power, and that the depression was world-wide in all branches of trade. The Republicans use these stock arguments whenever as standpatters they are called on to defend the wool schedule.

Our protectionist friends attempt to make much of the fact that a sharp decline in the price of wool followed the passage of the Wilson bill in 1894. They attribute that decline to the placing of wool on the free list, when the fact is that the price of wool began to fall below the general level of the prices which had prevailed for several years to 1885, but after a decline of 6 to 10 cents a pound in that year prices took a lower level, which was maintained till the financial depression of 1893 set in when a still further decline took place, until in April, 1895, fine wool dropped to 16½ cents a pound, the lowest price ever known in the eastern markets. Chester Whitney Wright, in his "Wool Growing and the Tariff," writing of the effect of the Wilson tariff law on the price of wool, says:

> The final enactment of this bill in August, 1894, had but little effect, its expected passage and the general business depression having previously made allowances for it.

Again, the increased use of cotton for clothing had considerably to do with lessening the demand for woolen goods, and consequently lessening the demand for wool. It will be observed that there are three great downward slides as to the production of the sheep and wool, but they are silent as to two of them, but proclaim loud as to that from 1893 to 1897. This happened to be during a Democratic administration, and therefore charged to the reduction of the tariff on wool. It is true that during this period there was a decrease of 9,500,000 sheep, or more than 3,000,000 a year. But how about the slide from 1885 to 1890? During this latter period the average duty on wool was about 11 cents, or practically that of the Dingley law, yet we lost 18,000,000 sheep. It surely will not be contended that the removal of the tariff had anything to do with that.

In the decline of the production of wool and sheep we find that, as stated, in 1903–1905 the number of sheep decreased 19,000,000, or that in two years there was a reduction in the number three times as great as the loss when there was no tariff on wool and when the duty on wool under the Dingley law was 11 cents a pound, as it is to-day. It will certainly not be denied that there are other causes which are shown by these figures which operate to decrease the number of sheep. Among these causes are winter exposure, scarcity of food, the depredation of dogs, wild animals, and thieves, the high price of land, and the low price of wool.

In 1895, according to the agricultural report, winter exposure killed off 2.9 per cent, or 967,000 sheep, while losses from all other sources was over 857,000. If we add these together we would find that the loss was 1,824,000, or within 100,000 of the loss of 1896 over 1895. In other words, the low price of wool had little or no perceptible effect, as it was limited to less than one-third of 1 per cent.

We hope to be able to show that the Wilson bill was not responsible for the fall in prices from 1890 to 1896. Souerback's compilation of prices on 45 staples for England, Prof. Conrad's compilation for Germany, the Bank of Japan for 40 staples for Japan, and the compilation of Economic Research for the United States show the change in prices of 1890–1900:

[1] Fall. [2] Rise.

All of these countries, as we know, were on a gold basis. The United States had the advantage of high-tariff legislation, yet all of them had a rise beginning in 1896, so that the cause of prosperity must have been something more than tariff legislation one year after the rise began. In England this rise in prices began in 1895, two years before the passage of the Dingley law. The fall in prices in three of these countries began in 1890, while the Wilson bill was not passed until 1894 and had nothing to do with the decline.

The money question had much to do with this world-wide depression. During the period the gold of the world was hoarded, and there is no doubt that the fall of 15 to 24 per cent was due to the limited supply of gold, and the rise in prices was due largely to the increased production of the metal. It must not be forgotten that Russia had obtained $500,000,000 of the supply of gold, which she hoarded and did not begin to pay out until 1897, when she returned $300,000,000 again to circulation. Austria also hoarded gold from 1890 to 1896 and returned it to circulation in 1897. France, Germany, and England also protected themselves by increasing their supply of gold from 1887 to 1896 more than had ever been done in their history.

We must not forget the fact that about the time that the gold began to be returned to circulation there came a rise in prices the world over. It must also be remembered that there came a larger production of gold in 1897. These are large factors in the rise and fall of prices all over the world. The rise and fall of prices for four years before and after 1896 correspond to the rise and fall of the world's deficit and surpluses for the same quadrennial period. It is also true that the fall of prices of gold and the rise in prices of 1896–1899 to the fall of that commodity. There is no doubt had the Wilson bill continued to 1899 there would have been the same rise in prices. It must also be remembered the prices began to rise in 1896, before the passage of the Dingley law, and that this increase of prices is entirely outside of the power and force of that law.

It must also be remembered that the rise and fall of prices were world-wide during this late period, while the Dingley law, of course, was only confined to the United States. It must not be forgotten that the increased production of gold effected this world-wide rise in prices, while the passage of the Dingley law effected the creation of many trusts in the United States, and this produced the rise in the American trust-made goods far in advance of the slighter world-wide advances. In England prices rose, from 1896 to 1897, 27 per cent, and in the United States 49 per cent; and in 1908, 61 per cent. The English rise in prices may be fairly taken as a result of the increased supply of gold, and in our own country the increase would be divided as follows:

It is clear that prices of wool were as low relatively abroad for the period 1894–1897 as they were in the United States.

It is plainly evident that no duty whatever from 1894 to 1903 was needed to protect American woolgrowers, but that notwithstanding this, the duty, or a part of it, was added to the price. The foreign price in 1903–4 was higher than the domestic. The foreign could not compete duty paid in 1905; the duty, 22 cents, added to the foreign price, 19½ cents, made 51½ cents laid down in New York, against the home price of 35½ cents. Foreign wool in 1906, 1907, and 1908 was as high as domestic, irrespective of duty. During the periods of two or three years natural law fixed foreign prices as high as, or higher than, our prices, during which the woolgrowers needed no protection.

On first-class washed wool not on the skin the duty is 22 cents a pound—a rate not justifiable by foreign prices. Domestic wool at all times could have held its own without a tariff of any kind. Domestic woolgrowers produce about two-thirds of all the wool consumed in the United States; the remaining one-third must be purchased abroad. The above table shows beyond peradventure that the woolgrowers of the United States not only have the domestic market, but can always have that market for all their goods, and can stand a material reduction in the present tariff laws.

American wool in the markets to-day is selling for less, compared with what it might sell for, inasmuch as foreign wools, duty unpaid, are running at about the same price.

It is contended by the opponents of free wool, and the opponents of this bill as well, that taking the tariff off of wool or reducing it tends to lower the price. A comparison of prices under the Walker tariff, that placed a 30 per cent tariff on wool, under the tariff of 1857, which placed wool on the free list, and the Morrill tariff of 1861, do not sustain this contention. During the life of the Walker tariff the average price of wool was 45.5 cents per pound, and during the three years that wool was on the free list under the tariff of 1857 the price was 44.6 cents a pound, a decrease of only nine-tenths of a cent a pound. [Applause.]

It is true that a rise in the price of wool followed the enactment of the Morrill tariff law in March, 1861, and from 1862 to 1865 the average currency price advanced from 44.6 cents in 1861 to 73.49 cents in 1865, or an average increase of 67 per cent. The tariff had little or nothing to do with this increase. The increased demand for wool to clothe one of the largest armies the world has ever seen during those years may have had a slight tendency to increase prices; but the truth is, there was very little increase in the price of wool during those years, when you reckon prices on the gold basis. That the prices of wool from 1862 to 1879, when the resumption of specie payments was declared, were inflated prices, is shown by the fact that the prices of wool steadily declined from the average price for the three grades of 51 cents a pound in 1880 to 22.6 cents a pound in 1894, with the duty ranging from 42.60 to 108.24 per cent.

This is more clearly shown by the following table, taken from the report of the tariff commission of 1882 (vol. 2, p. 2435):

Average prices of domestic wool per pound.

	July, 1857–April, 1861—Gold.	April, 1861–July, 1864.		July, 1864–April, 1867.
		Paper.	Gold.	Paper.	Gold.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Fine	49.15	66.15	47.73	75.54	49.05
Medium	42.73	64.23	46.73	71.12	46.01
Coarse	33.69	57.15	38.20	65.00	41.63

An analysis of the prices in this table will show that, measured by the gold standard which prevailed in 1861, the net increase in the average price of wool during the Civil War and the 11 years subsequent thereto was only 3.71 cents per pound, so that the increased demand for wool occasioned by the war and the high protective tariff together advances the gold price of wool only $8\frac{8}{10}$ cents a pound.

If it were true that the woolgrowers are benefited by a high protective duty on wool, it is unjust to the consumers who constitute the greater part of our people. To show the inequality and injustice of the high protective tariff on wool and woolen goods, take the State of Illinois, which I have the honor to represent in part. The amount of raw wool and its equivalent in fabric consumed by the people of my State during the year 1910 amount to about 40,000,000 pounds, while the production of raw wool amounted to only 2,450,000 pounds, or slightly more than one-twentieth of the amount consumed.

The average rate of duty for the same year on all classes of wool was 44.31 per cent, so that the 5,638,591 people of Illinois were taxed to the tune of $4,600,000 on raw wool alone, and in addition were taxed at exorbitant rates on the woolen goods they consumed. [Applause.]

According to the census reports for 1910 there are 250,853 farms in the State of Illinois. Of this number only 26,240 made returns of sheep, so that only about one out of ten of the farmers of my State keep sheep on their farms, and these only keep them as a side line, for the purpose of consuming forage and roughage that other stock will not eat, and for their value for clearing up fields that have run to briers and undergrowth. The few farmers who keep sheep do not keep them for their wool clip, but for mutton, usually selling their male lambs as soon as they are of marketable age, keeping the ewes for breeding purposes. The farmers of my district and, I believe, of the whole State of Illinois are vastly more interested in securing cheaper woolen goods for themselves and their families than they are in maintaining excessive tariff rates on wool and woolen goods.

The farmers of my district are intelligent men, who love justice and fair dealing, and none of them are asking or desiring that Congress shall enact laws that will give them an advantage over other classes of their fellow-citizens. I have not had a single protest against the passage of this bill from my people, and I feel confident that my vote for this measure will receive the hearty approval of an overwhelming majority, if not all, of my constituents, irrespective of their political affiliations. [Applause.]

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read to you what I consider one of the most remarkable statements that has been made in years in another body at the other end of the Capitol. It is as follows:

So, Mr. President, even though we were receiving no benefit from our present protective duties the future welfare of the farmers of wheat, barley, oats, and flax demands the maintenance of the present protective law. That, Mr. President, is what I have been praying for. I hoped to live to see the day—

Mark you these words—

when production of wheat in this country might be a little less than the home demand, just sufficiently less to give the farmer the full benefit of protection.

I am surprised that there is any man who would stand in Congress and say that he hoped and prayed that a time might come in this fair land of ours when wheat and bread would be so scarce that in consequence the price must be raised because we are compelled to import it from a foreign country. Has the protective theory of our Government gone so far that protectionists pray that the bread which goes into the mouths of our people may be made higher in price by being taxed? [Applause on the Democratic side].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Could I get about 10 minutes more?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois 10 minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am sure no farmer in all this land is offering such a prayer. He loves justice and fairness too well to ask such advantage of his neighbor, though he does want the best price for his products to which he is justly entitled. He is tired of being compelled to sell the products of his farm in competition with the world and to buy the necessaries of life for himself and his family in a restricted market; and each time he makes a purchase he is compelled to unjustly give up a part of his earnings to the protected interests. It is unjust and unfair to the farmer, and I for one am here to protest against such treatment. What I do want, and what I insist on, is that the producer shall have fair treatment. He wants no more, he should have no less. [Applause.]

The reductions of duty under this bill and placing articles on an ad valorem rate certainly is an improvement over the Payne-Aldrich bill, because the duties on all wool and woolen goods are at least 50 per cent less than under the law now in existence. The letter of Edward Moir, from which Mr. MANN, the distinguished minority leader quoted the other day on the pending bill, says:

Special privilege was written into the tariff bill in 1867, and by shrewd manipulation has been continued by the Republican Party in the revised Schedule K.

The duty on yarn of 30 per cent is certainly a great reduction over the present duty, which amounts to 82.38 per cent; that on cloths, knit fabrics, and so forth, a reduction from 97.11 to 40 per cent, will give relief to the people under the Payne tariff. On blankets and flannels composed wholly or partly of wool from 95.57 to 30 and 45 per cent is a reduction that will certainly be appreciated by the buyers of these articles. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] talked of the tariff of 45 per cent upon women's and children's dress goods he seemed to lay some stress upon the statement he made of the taxing of these necessary articles 45 per cent, and in that way tried to cover up the fact that these same articles are now taxed under the Payne-Aldrich bill to the amount 102.85 per cent, a saving of more than 50 per cent upon this class of goods under the bill now under consideration.

The woman who goes to the merchant to buy a woolen dress for herself or children will certainly be thankful that she is not robbed of the extra $4.50 out of every $10 purchase she makes. On ready-made clothing and articles of wearing apparel the reduction from 81.31 to 45 per cent will certainly be appreciated by the people who buy this class of goods, and it must be remembered that those who can not afford to pay $40 or $50 for a tailor-made suit must depend upon the ready-made clothing for their supply, and I am sure this class of people will not forget the fact that they were taxed this extra amount under the present law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On webbings, goring, and other articles enumerated under paragraph 9 the reduction from 87.6 per cent to 35 per cent will relieve the Woolen Trust of a portion of its protection, which it now enjoys at the expense of the American people. The large reduction on the different class of carpets will be of benefit to those who buy this class of goods, and will enable the American people to purchase carpets, rugs, and so forth, from 10 to 35 per cent less than they are now able to do. So, considering this bill from the interest of the consumer. those who are compelled to buy of the class of articles enumerated in this bill, there is certainly relief to the people from this unjust taxation and it takes away from the Woolen Trust the right to exploit the American consumer.

The Democratic Party has stood, and still stands, for the principle of the lowest possible tax on wool and woolen goods. This has been a cardinal principle of the party, on account of the almost universal use of this commodity, that they should be taxed as little as possible so the people who are compelled to buy may not be subject to the demands of the trust. The party does not believe that it is right to tax a person who is compelled to buy a blanket to keep him warm, more than a hundred per cent, or a suit of clothes, which he is compelled to buy for himself or family, of several times the value of the wool that enters into its manufacture.

The poor of this country, who have shivered in the wintry winds, will be thankful that they are able to buy woolen clothes at a reasonable price, and not be compelled to pay tribute to the Woolen Trust of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These trust magnates, who are ever ready to contend for the right by law to put their hands in the pockets of the people, remind me of a story of one member of these protected industries, who had his picture painted and called in his friend to examine it. There was a finely painted picture of the man standing erect with his hand in his pocket, and, after viewing his friend's picture for a few minutes, he was asked his opinion of it. He replied: "It is a good likeness of you, but there is just one thing wrong; you have your hand in your pocket, but, to make it natural, you ought to have your hand in some other person's pocket." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This bill may not meet the expectations of all men who believe in lower taxes on manufactured woolens or free wool, but it does reduce very materially the tax on these articles. When wool is reduced from 44 per cent per pound to 20, it is a material reduction, and the average reduction of manufactures of wool, reduced from an average ad valorem duty of 90.10 per cent to 42.55 per cent, will give some relief to the buyers of this class of goods. As Democrats, let us not forget our promises made to the people to reduce taxation on the necessaries of life that the burden of the people might be as light as possible and that the highest tax should be placed on the luxuries.

The last platform of the Democratic Party declared we were for a gradual reduction of tariff taxation to a revenue basis. We are not going to forget our pledges to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We propose to go on and revise the whole Payne-Aldrich tariff law until all the schedules are brought to a revenue basis. Having put our hands to the plow, there will be no turning back. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For the Democratic Party to hesitate or falter in its purpose to reduce taxation, to put a stop to the reckless and unnecessary expenditure of the people's money, would be to show itself unworthy of the high trust and confidence reposed in it by the people. The Democratic Party has turned its face toward the pole star of freedom, and with the old Democratic shibboleth of "equal rights for all and special privileges for none" emblazoned on its pure white banner it will rally to its sacred cause the men and women of this land who love liberty and justice, and in God's own good time it will deliver this Government from the hands of the spoiler and the greed of the privileged few and place it again in the hands of the people. Then will this Government be conducted in the plain, simple, frugal manner in which it was conducted by the Democratic Party for more than half a century, during which period millionaires were few, tramps were unknown, and there was no such thing as enforced idleness in all the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And when that glad day shall come and justice resumes her sway, every man will be secure in the enjoyment of his earnings, and be able to live "under his own vine and fig tree, with none to molest or make him afraid." Then will the justice and righteousness of the principles of pure and unadulterated Democracy be crystallized in the Constitution and laws of our country. Those principles which will be living, vital principles when—

The sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment Book unfold.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

When these glorious principles bear their full fruitage in the legislation and administration of the affairs of this Government, and the burdens of unjust and unequal taxation are lifted from the shoulders of the millions who toil and produce the wealth of this country, then will justice and freedom and Democracy hold sway, and the glad time will have come that was foretold by the Hebrew Seer—

And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.
They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant and another eat.

[Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss the bill [applause] now pending before the House—if it is pending, and has not already been acted upon [laughter on the Republican side]—and shall make, preliminarily, some reflections upon the business of the House as it has progressed thus far, as to which our friends on the other side of the aisle are patting themselves on the back and telling what a good record they have made up to the present time; and after that I propose to discuss the present tariff law; and when I am discussing that, so far as I have time, if there is anybody on that side of the House who knows anything about it, I would like to have them ask questions; and even if they do not know anything about it, I would still like to have them ask questions. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, our friends on that side are telling us what a wonderful record they have made. Well, they have passed a joint resolution to amend the Constitution with respect to the election of Senators. I voted in this House for such a joint resolution—not precisely like this—on three different occasions, when nearly all of the Members of the House joined in voting for it. But there was no "joker" in the joint resolution that we proposed. We did not amend anything else than the Constitution. This House passed a law, a sort of corrupt-practice act, in relation to the election of Members of the House, an amendment to the bill that we proposed a year ago in this House, and sent it over to the Senate, requiring the publication of campaign expenses as applied to Members of the House; and then the next day you provided for the election of Senators by a popular vote, and also provided that Congress can not regulate or require publicity or do anything else with reference to the honest election of United States Senators.

Now, if they can get any satisfaction out of that, if there is any reason in all that why they should refer to it as a wonderful record, they had better make the most of it speedily, because the truth will get out and will get after them in a few days, and the country will see what a perpetual humbug all legislation of that kind is, proposing to do something and then nullifying it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That resolution will come over here from the Senate—it is here now. It will have to be acted upon by the House in a few days, and I shall look at the roll call when we come to the vote to agree to the Senate amendment, because they have left in the Constitution the power for Congress to pass a corrupt-practice act in reference to senatorial elections if this amendment carries, and I want to see how many men there are on that side of the aisle who voted for a corrupt-practice act in regard to Members of the House who will vote to prohibit the Congress of the United States from passing a corrupt-practice act in regard to the popular election of Senators of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] Well, they passed the reciprocity bill——

Mr. GARNER. Before the gentleman goes to the reciprocity bill, will he yield for an interruption?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Did the gentleman from New York vote for the resolution offered and passed by the House, amending the Constitution, providing for the direct election of Senators?

Mr. PAYNE. I have voted for it in three prior Congresses. As the gentleman knows, I was unable to be in the House at the time that resolution passed at this session of Congress. I have voted for such a resolution three times since I have been in Congress.

Mr. GARNER. A number of gentlemen on his side of the House did vote for the resolution, and I did not know that they had the custom of voting for things that had jokers in them. The gentleman says this had a joker in it.

Mr. PAYNE. Sometimes, when we have a Democratic House and a Republican Senate, it is well to get the resolution over to the Senate, in order that it may be put in proper shape. [Applause on the Republican side.] So these gentlemen were entirely excusable for voting in the way they did.

But you passed the reciprocity bill. You have passed what you call a free-list bill. You have sometimes had the courage, to say nothing about the lack of discretion, to call it a farmers' free-list bill. I suppose that is because the farmer's meat is put on the free list, not only as to Canada where it is not now, even under the reciprocity arrangement, but as to the Argentine Republic, Australia, New Zealand, everywhere where they raise beef, and can raise it more cheaply than we can in the United States.

Well, if you are disposed to do that, I am perfectly willing you should, but think of the amazing effrontery of saying that it is a farmers' free-list bill. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Did the farmers want it? Did the farmers ask for it? Why do you call it that? Well, of course, I am not in the councils of the Democratic Party, but I can see what is going on. There is some resentment amongst the farmers about the reciprocity business. You have heard of it. I also have heard more or less about it. About the time you began to hear that, and it was coming in here, and you had in mind this free-list bill, you dubbed it a farmers' free-list bill for the purpose of fooling the farmers on that subject. Well, when the farmers get hold of a question and settle it by reflecting upon it in their own minds, they generally settle it right. I mean the real farmers. I do not mean the fellows who sit down on a sugar barrel in the grocery store and discuss public questions while their farms are going to rack and ruin; I do not mean the farmer who leaves his tools out during the winter because he has not the energy to put them under shelter, or has not had the energy to provide shelter for them; but I mean the real, hard-working, thrifty farmer. When he stops to read and think, in the winter evenings, he may not have anything more than a weekly paper from which to get his news, but when he comes to his final conclusion he is generally right about it. He may be led away by fake publications for a while, but he gets around to the real thing before he gets through, and when any party starts in to gain popularity and win the vote of the farmer by proposing things that would not deceive an ordinary 12-year-old child, we will find, when it comes around to election day, that the farmer has not been fooled by the operation.

What is there that you have done at this session of Congress that you pride yourselves on? I know you talk about the splendid record of this Congress, but what have you really done that entitles you to anything on that record? You have passed that free-list bill, and there is not a man on either side of this House who can tell anywhere from $15,000,000 to $50,000,000 what the cut will be in the revenue on account of that free-list bill. No such crude measure was ever brought into the House by any party as that bill.

You tied yourselves up in advance in the caucus. I heard some man shouting this morning about how you had gotten rid of the one-man power in this Congress. It does not make any difference whether it is one man who enforces the rules in the Speaker's chair, who appears in the open and whose acts and deeds are known and read of all men, or whether he pulls the wires that control the caucus, and the caucus votes blindly, without knowing what is in the bill, and especially without knowing what is the effect of the bill, to stand by it to a man when it comes into the House, and not vote for any amendment, no matter how ridiculous the amendment offered shows the bill to be. You call that ridding yourselves of the tyranny of your leaders.

You criticized us in the years past for coming in here with a rule and having a five minutes' debate on a tariff bill, and allowing amendments proposed by the committee first to be considered, and because we did not get through with the entire reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

How much better is it for you to discuss a great bill like this wool bill for four hours in caucus and having four hours' debate in favor of the proposition, and giving five minutes' debate against the proposition, and then agreeing in caucus to stand by that bill?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I wish to correct the gentleman from New York, because in the caucus the arguments and discussions occupied 10 hours.

Mr. PAYNE. I accept the amendment; and still there was five minutes for the opposition. I have understood that my friend from Colorado did not stay during the whole time of the caucus.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I was there all the time.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not the gentleman walk out?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. No; I did not walk out. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Was the gentleman carried out, or did he roll out, or how did he get out? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I wish further to correct the gentleman, in that the caucus did not bind every Member on this side. I think the gentleman will remember that I was the only Member on this side who was permitted to offer an amendment of free meat to the provision of the bill, which I did, and was the only Member on this side who voted for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am learning something; I did not know anything about that. I am glad there is one man on the whole Democratic side that still does his thinking under his own hat and carries his conscience with him, even into the sacred precincts of the Democratic caucus. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That may be a good way to legislate, but I do not believe the people of this country are in favor of it. I do not believe the people of the country think that you are redeeming your pledges of free discussion and deliberation here and allowing every man to do as he pleases. What difference does it make if the caucus, at the dictation of one or two men, makes up the legislative program and sits down on any fellow that proposes anything different?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. In a moment; I will yield as I go along. How about that situation over in Atlanta? I understand the Government has turned over some real estate to the city, and the city has built a courthouse, or a city building, on this Government reservation, and a Member from down there is not allowed to bring up a little bill to remove the Government exclusive criminal jurisdiction on that little parcel of land so that the people who put their money into the county building may be able to hold court there.

Are you proud of that thing? Have you the pride to go before the American people and tell them honestly about it and say, "Look at us; we have fulfilled our pledges to the American people"? [Applause on the Republican side.]

You brought in the wool bill. How many agreed to it? I do not mean now, but when it was first proposed. How many of you agreed to it then? How many of you wanted a bigger duty on wool? How many wanted an absolutely free wool bill? It was reported that a majority of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, a majority of four, were in favor of free wool. They finally yielded. Yielded to what? What is the influence behind this duty on wool? Are you advertising that you are trying to appear so prettily before the American people, so nicely and so divested of everything that you have been ranting about for the last 10 years on the stump, that the American people will put you in full possession of the Government in 1912? You are on your good behavior. Twenty per cent duty on wool now. Some of you can not help flopping over. I believe the caucus allowed you to speak when you got into the House. How many came in and said this is only a step in the right direction, and you hoped to get down to the Democratic idea by and by?

Are you trying to justify what that great Democrat from Lincoln, Nebr., said about you—masquerading? Not only masquerading, but derelict to principle. He said he does not believe that you can fool the people. Well, Mr. Chairman, he ought to know—he has had ample experience. [Laughter.] He does not believe that you can fool the people by any such moonshine as that. He has learned something from his experience—why do you not try to learn something also? Why do you not bring in what you actually believe? Why do you not allow your people to vote as they actually believe? Why do you shut out my colleague from New York [Mr. HARRISON], who is a member of the Ways and Means Committee? He is brimful of this subject of free wool. Why not let him in on this debate? Why close it up to-night? He might tell you something about it. He might hold up the Democratic platform. He might hold up the Democratic bills that you put in one after another when you had a chance of passing them in the House, and that you have passed in the House. He might tell you some wholesome truths on the whole subject. Is there any suppression over there? Is there any idea of tyranny, or are you afraid? Well, you are about as free as the white slaves we hear so much about.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does not the gentleman from New York, the distinguished ex-chairman of the committee, realize that the Democrats have settled their differences on this question in caucus and are all going to stand together on this bill in the House?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, Mr. Chairman, I do not realize that they have settled their differences. They have had their differences of opinion for, lo, these many years, and they have their thinking machines with them. They have not settled anything. They want to get this bill through; they are told it is politic to get it through, and they are yielding their principles to the policy of the thing because some gentlemen at home have told them that it would ruin them, and that it would ruin their State if they did not do something about putting a duty on wool. There is my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who rose to ask a question a short time ago——

Mr. GARNER. And the gentleman from New York declined to yield at that time.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I did at that time, but I said I would yield later, and I desire to yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from New York continues to criticize caucus action on the part of the Democrats in this House. I want to ask the gentleman if he is opposed to party caucus?

Mr. PAYNE. Not at all.

Mr. GARNER. Why does the gentleman continue to criticize the thing he has advocated himself on his side of the House?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I am criticizing it because it shows that the Democratic Party, divided about equally on this question, are swallowing their convictions now—not so much the caucus do I criticize, but the reason that you give and that crops out here as to why you take this action.

Mr. GARNER. The reason we gave was that under your régime, under a Republican House, you had a one-man caucus, where under a Democratic House we have a 227-man caucus. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Well, and one man pulls the lever and you all follow. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now, the wool question is a warm question with my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. He has a lot of sheep in his district and a lot of shepherds, and while the sheep do not vote down there I suppose the shepherds do. Why, it would crucify him to vote for a free-wool bill. I bet you he told you so. [Laughter.] Try to fool those people down there in Texas with a free-wool bill! I do not know but in principle he believes in a duty on wool. I do not know but in principle he is a protectionist on wool, but I do know where his interests are, and that is for a duty on wool. Well, you have to have a duty on wool I suppose to get the boys together, not for the purpose of protecting wool. Oh, no! The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], whom I do not see in his seat now, in his speech of delayed publication in the RECORD, as I recollect it, said that there was not any line of protection for the wool or the wool industry in this bill. It was especially divorced from that. My friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will not circulate that speech in his district—that speech of Chairman UNDERWOOD. Oh, no! He will confine it to the speech of the gentleman at whom I am looking now, and from him get speeches to serve out as the proper pabulum for the people down there in his district.

Why, Mr. Chairman, they even had to tag this bill when they brought it in here. There was the other gentleman from Texas—and I am sorry I do not see him here now, because he told me the other day that he wanted to be here when I made my speech. Well, I am here and he is not, but in his absence I will have to speak about some things that occurred when the bill came in. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] was asking unanimous consent to have a resolution read so as to get it in the RECORD. He said it was short, and so forth, and no objection was made to the resolution and it was read. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy.

What in the world did you put that in for? Did you have the idea anybody would construe that as an abandonment of Democratic policies? If you did not, why did you put it in? Oh, I know confession is good for the soul, but why not make an open confession? Why subject yourselves to the charges that are coming from that great Democratic organ which is published at Lincoln, Nebr., about your bad faith—how you are going to fail to fool the people on this proposition? Why, you confess that it is against Democratic policies by the very language of this resolution, and I have here very competent authority, the chairman of that caucus, that this resolution is "God's truth." I think that part of it by way of confession is. You are abandoning Democratic principles and policies.

But in view of the Democratic platform demand for a "gradual reduction" of the tariff and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury, a result of Republican extravagance, a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Was it stated in that meeting yesterday that there is now a surplus for this fiscal year of from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 in the Treasury?

Well, I did not look at the daily report for two or three days, but there was $8,000,000 surplus in the Treasury according to the Treasury report of that day.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not recall that any statement of that character was made.

Mr. PAYNE. Was a statement made that the Treasury was $20,00,000 better off to-day, or, rather, the 31st day of May——

Mr. BURLESON. No.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). Than it was a year ago?

Mr. BURLESON. No; there was not a single erroneous statement made during the entire caucus proceeding. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I ask unanimous consent to print the Treasury statement of May 31, in order that the gentlemen on the other side may have exactly the official information which I was trying to give the gentleman from Texas by a question, but it appears he would not accept it——

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I join in the request in order that the statement of the gentleman from New York may be thoroughly refuted.

Why, you made BURLESON believe it in that caucus. Of course I assume the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee made the same statement he made to the House a few days afterwards, because he made it over at the time he made his speech, and he seems to be reflecting on it ever since he made his speech. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

I began to have cold chills, because I did not know but the sheep in Mr. GARNER's district were going to cut off the truth—

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to get that consent, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York will suspend, the Chair will endeavor to get the consent. Is there objection to the publication of the statement which the gentleman from New York mentioned? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The statement follows.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARNER. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that his time may be extended for five minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. Oh, ha, ha, ha.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, did any gentleman rise in his place and object?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was standing in the aisle when he objected.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Well, I think everybody understands the Treasury statement in the House now; even Mr. BURLESON, of Texas, the chairman of the caucus, I think, understands it now. If they do, it is hardly worth while to mention it now. If they do not understand it, I commend them to page 1720 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that they may see the statement on that date, and if they do not get it into their understanding the first time, why try the daily statements of the Treasury as they come out and see if you can not understand them. The statement made yesterday was that we are $24,437,570.98 better off than we were a year ago on that date, and while we have that deficit of $12,000,000 for a year ago at that date, but a surplus of $15,806,328.94 at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1910, it looks as though I put it a little too low when I suggested that the surplus at the end of this fiscal year, June 30, will be $35,000,000. If the corporation tax is paid in this year as promptly as it was last year, it will be $40,000,000 surplus at the end of the year. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, why did not some of you people challenge that statement when it was made in the caucus that there was a deficit in the Treasury, that there was going to be a deficit of $50,000,000 at the end of this year, some of you people who want free wool? I do not see my friend from New York on the Ways and Means Committee. Of course he knew about these daily statements. I supposed that all members of the committee took these and examined them from day to day as they had the time to do so; why did not the gentleman state that in the caucus?

An honest statement in the caucus as to the surplus would have defeated this "hypocritical" caucus resolution, and this bill would never have received a two-thirds vote.

Why did he not state that in the caucus? Was it because you only had 5 minutes' debate on the side of free wool and 10 hours on the other side? Was that the reason of it? Could you not get the time? Why let the Democratic Party go wrong? Why not let them hunt around for another reason and not put it all on the deficit in the Treasury and the necessity for getting revenue in order to save that deficit? Why did you not do it? You do not seem to be very anxious to answer—any of you. Did you not know it? Was that the reason? Did one man fool this whole caucus with a Treasury statement? How much better it would be for you to bring in a bill here and learn something, even if you had to learn it from this side of the House, rather than make such an egregious blunder as that and herald it to the country. It shows the necessity of having two parties; shows the necessity of party consideration and opposition in debate; shows that you might have learned something even from Republicans if you had stopped and hearkened long enough, because you have learned it now. You all understand it now, and you are all looking forward and anticipating the time when you will meet your dear constituents, and they will want to know why, when this tax of 20 per cent was put on wool and they did not get it on the free list in the caucus, you did not dispute the statement about the $50,000,000 deficit that was going to happen on a Treasury statement. Oh, what a sorry spectacle you make. And still in the face of all of it, like the animal that is first cousin to the Democratic Party, you parade around in a lion's skin and say, "What bold people we are and what a splendid record we are making to go before the people with." [Applause on the Republican side.]

You even fooled the college professor over here in New Jersey, who is and wants to be a presidential candidate, into believing you have made a good record on the wool question, however much he may have been bound up in free wool, as he was against the initiative and the referendum and the recall until he saw the sudden light that gleamed from the White House a few months ago and found there was good in all things. I think it was on his western trip that he discovered that. I do not know whether he saw the light or whether he listened with his ears and the bee got buzzing in his bonnet and whispered to him how nicely "President Wilson" would sound to his family and his friends and himself. And he went back on the reason that he had given, against his whole life record, in favor of this initiative, referendum, and recall.

Now, gentlemen, of course, if you are proud of all of this thing, I have not anything more to say. If you glory in your shame, all I can do is to expose the shame and let you go on and have the glory. But you will get the ashes of disappointment when the people get hold of what you are doing and get after you, as they will, and see that your record was simply moonshine or worse and that you are trying to deceive them, in the language of the greatest Democrat who lives to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Well, let us get at this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from New York is certain that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] did make the statements in regard to the Treasury condition that he refers to in the House?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, certainly. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] the other day had the Official Reporter's notes, and read them to the House, and I do not know whether the gentleman from Wyoming will ever read them anywhere else or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I asked the question, Mr. Chairman, because I have been reading the RECORD very diligently ever since that time, and have not been able to find them in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know anything of where they are. I have not the slightest knowledge on that subject, whatever suspicion I may have.

Mr. MONDELL. The statement was undoubtedly made?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has had very long service in the House. Can the gentleman recall heretofore a time when the opening speech upon a tariff debate was not published until after the bill had been passed?

Mr. PAYNE. No. I recall a number of speeches that were pretty lengthy which were put in the RECORD next morning after they were made, and weeks before the bill passed the House. I remember one speech of mine of nine hours and a half that, I think, got into the next day's RECORD, although it took two days for delivery. But then there had not been any blunder pointed out in that speech about the depletion of the Treasury [applause and laughter on the Republican side]—a statement $85,000,000 out of the way. I am not saying that the speech was perfect, but still I do not know that any question was ever raised concerning the speech or respecting any statement contained in it. But whether it was or not, there was not any such blunder as that in it, or any such reason as that for keeping it out of the RECORD.

I do not say that there is any such reason in this case. The gentleman from Alabama is a friend of mine, an intimate friend of mine, and I like him very much. He has a good deal of sense, and sense on the tariff question. I supposed he knew more about the daily Treasury reports. I am disappointed in him in that. And I had supposed he knew more about the construction of a tariff bill than that. But I remember now that he never had any hand in the construction of a tariff bill before. The Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee made the McKinley bill, the Dingley bill, and the present bill; and, if I remember correctly, the gentleman from Alabama was not here when the Wilson bill was under consideration. If he was here he was not a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

I was disappointed when I looked over that free-list bill, when I looked at the language that was employed, the terms, the indefinite terms, the chance to drive a four-mule team right through any of the provisions when the goods got into the customhouse, if they ever did get in under a bill like that.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from New York yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. PAYNE. In just one moment; yes. Why, Mr. Chairman, the hardest work, the most exacting work in the formation of a tariff bill is to study the language in its provisions, in view of the industry, in view of the manufacturing, in view of how it will be interpreted by the courts, so that the bill will be interpreted as meaning just what the committee that framed it means; and weeks and months have been spent in studying these questions on all the three bills with the construction of which I was intimately connected.

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does not the gentleman from New York think that the fact that the gentleman from Alabama, as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has been actively in charge of all the debates on the floor of this House ever since the day when he made his speech a few days ago is a sufficient excuse, by reason of his duties in the House, for his not having had time to revise his remarks?

Mr. PAYNE. I am not criticizing him. All I can do is to say to my friends on the other side that I have had charge of this debate on this side, and if I had made the opening speech I would have had plenty of time to correct my speech and put it in the RECORD the next day. Two years ago I had charge of the tariff bill and made the opening speech, and my recollection is that I published it in the next day's RECORD after the speech was delivered. I am not finding fault with the gentleman from Alabama. In fact, if I had made that speech of his, I think I would never publish it in the RECORD at all. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman will admit, at any rate, that there is sufficient excuse without his going to the length of imputing an unfounded motive to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know what peculiar experience the gentleman from Alabama has had. In what the gentleman from New York states there is not sufficient excuse; but there may have been a number of other duties for him to perform that I do not know anything about, and the gentleman from Alabama, occupying the responsible positions of chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and chairman of the committee that peddled out the selection of members of the committees of the House, has been peculiarly busy, and he has shared the responsibility—I assume he has; I have not been to any of their conferences—with the Speaker of the House in formulating the plans of the Democratic Party in order to give orders to the Democratic caucus as to what they should do, and has been sustaining those orders as well as he could in debate in the Democratic caucuses. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I do not recall, however, that there have been many Democratic caucuses recently. There was one Democratic caucus the other night, but it lasted only a few minutes. I saw one of my Democratic friends go to it and return in a very short time. It hardly seemed any time at all after he went away before he returned. There was only one Democratic caucus held since the gentleman's speech was made. Now, I hope I have answered the gentleman's question.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, introduced the Walker tariff into the discussion and spoke about the wonderful prosperity of the country under the Walker tariff, and he attributed it all, by implication, to the Walker tariff. Well, the country was prosperous in a way. Prices were good, people were moving West, and people bought farms, building up the farming industries in the West.

Sheep did not thrive amazingly, but some of them survived. There was the Crimean War, which made a market for farm produce for three or four years during the period of the Walker tariff. My friend from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], generally a learned man, had never read of that, or he forgot to mention it in his speech, or perhaps it did not chime in and would have been a note of discord in his speech if he had mentioned it. During the early years of that tariff we had the Mexican War, and that made a great demand for American goods and American foodstuffs.

Then gold was discovered in California in 1849. You all know about that. Even those who were not born in 1849 know that from reading it in history. That added to the wealth of this country. Great heavens! something had to add to it, because of the drain on the resources of the country under the Walker tariff. I have a little statement here showing something about that drain.

The Walker tariff went into effect December 1, 1846, and was succeeded by another tariff of similar import, with some changes, with lower ad valorems, July 1, 1857.

In the first fiscal year of the Walker tariff, while it had been a law only seven months, there was an excess of exports over imports of $34,000,000. That excess had been running for several years, and the balance of trade was in our favor, and even the Walker tariff, in the first seven months of its existence, had not entirely wiped it out. If it had not been for the Walker tariff, the balance in our favor that year would undoubtedly have been larger.

In 1848 the balance was the other way, and it continued the other way every year that the Walker tariff was in existence for the next 10 years, and the total balance of trade against us for the 10 years was $291,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] If it had not been for the gold that came in, we would have been bankrupt to pay our debts abroad for the goods that we were buying. Of course, we were not paying the same expense then for the carrying trade, because we were getting a good deal of it in our own bottoms and our own people got the money, but this $291,000,000 was a dead loss, a give-away from the resources of the Nation, and had to be made up in some way. The California gold helped to do it.

But notwithstanding the Crimean War and the great exports of foodstuffs and farm products wasted in that great war, there was still this enormous balance of trade against the United States of imports over exports.

On the 8th day of December, 1857, at the close of 11 years of the Walker tariff, President Buchanan, in his message to Congress, took an entirely different view of the prosperity of the country from that presented by the gentleman from Georgia. Buchanan was in the midst of things and had the responsible duty of communicating to Congress on the state of the country. This is the gloomy picture he presented on the state of the country in that message:

> We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.
> Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people. With this the Government can not fail deeply to sympathize, though it may be without the power

This, it will be observed, follows closely upon the termination of the period under the Walker tariff.

Prior to this, and when the tariff of 1846 had been in force for six years, President Fillmore called attention more explicitly to the Walker tariff and the manner of its operation in his annual message sent to Congress in 1852, when he said:

> In my first message to Congress I called attention to what seemed to me some defects in the present tariff and recommended such modifications as in my judgment were best adapted to remedy the evils and promote the prosperity of the country. Nothing has since occurred to change my views on this important question. Without repeating the argument contained in my former message in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is the effect of large importations of foreign goods on our currency. Most of the gold of California as fast as it is coined finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost. Thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer is to that extent deprived of a home market for the sale of his products. In the third place, the destruction of manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our markets, and the consequent rise in articles sent here for sale is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England.

I sometimes think you gentlemen never would glory at all in Robert J. Walker if it was not for the fact that it has been so long since you have had any glory on that side of the Chamber. We took charge in 1860, and we have been doing business ever since, except the little time that you had Grover Cleveland, and most of you have not sense enough to be proud of Grover Cleveland. [Applause on the Republican side.] Some of you appreciate him, some of you cuss him even to this day; but when you point with pride you go back to 1846 and shout "Robert J. Walker!"

There was a time, not many years ago, when Cleveland was triumphant, that you pointed with pride to the great leader there in Nebraska. Not as many of you point with pride to Bryan now; but still everybody knows he will write your next platform when it comes to the convention, and will tell you whom you can nominate, and he will be the one-man power in that convention, although his presence is not here, and he could not be the one-man power in your caucus, owing to the exigencies of the occasion.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is as necessary to have wool and sheep in this country as it is to have battleships. [Applause on the Republican side.] This is no new discovery of mine. The statesmen of the past have always declared that principle. There have not been many who dissented from that. When driven to the wall, their claim has been that sheep would wear out their rivals, on lands that were valueless, tended by shepherds to whom 10 cents a day was a big wage, and would exist in this country without any protective tariff on them. But they do not dispute that sheep are necessary to put an army in the field. Why, it is as necessary to have Army blankets as it is to have guns and cartridges. The enemy may pick off some of the men with guns, but without good woolen blankets in the cold winter, colds, pneumonia, and all such kindred diseases will pick off a mighty sight more men than the guns of the enemy will.

We must have wool. How shall we get it? Well, we have had a duty on wool from the sixties on. You say the schedule is not right. I never concealed my opinions about the wool schedule. They were known two years ago. I wanted to revise and equalize the wool schedule, equalize the duties. I was not able to carry it through. We took some evidence on the subject.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee wait for about five minutes?

Mr. HULL. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question right on that point.

Mr. PAYNE. I have just opened a sentence on that point and I may cover the whole subject.

Mr. HULL. I wanted to inquire if the President was correct in his statement that it was through the influence of the woolgrowers and the woolen manufacturers that the schedule was not revised. The gentleman says that he was desirous of revising it but was prevented.

Mr. PAYNE. I would have told the gentleman all about that if he had waited a minute. We took considerable evidence on the wool question. Here is the volume on wool, 800 printed pages. We had long hearings, and nine volumes were published, and in those hearings we gave pretty full consideration to the wool question. After the people who desired to come before the committee had been heard, I subpœnaed people who did not desire to be heard. I summoned experts in order to get their knowledge on the subject of wool and the wool duty. I spent a great deal of time trying to work out a schedule. I was not like my friend from Alabama; I could not do it in two or three weeks. I was not like any member of the Democratic caucus; I could not understand the whole business in one evening. I am slower of thought than that. I worked it out. My idea was to put the specific duty on the amount of scoured wool in the fleece the same as we put a specific duty on the pounds of lead in ore or the pounds of sugar with the sugar and dirt together that comes with it. That would make a uniform duty on the wool. That would rid it of any inequalities that there were in the schedule. Inequalities exist, but not to the extent that the public or some Members of Congress believe. But there were some inconsistencies, some differences in duties. I could not convince my colleagues that I was right. We had not time to get the evidence on the subject to clearly present it; enough to satisfy me, but not enough to satisfy others. What other reasons there were for voting against the reduction of the duty, God knows; I do not. But I know that they claimed that they had not sufficient evidence of it to reduce this schedule.

You know that they were men that wanted light; they were not like you people on that side, who can take up great industries involving $400,000,000 and with a single dash of the pen, without thinking and without knowing, and not requiring evidence of any Tariff Board or data, dispose of it at once; they were men who wanted to know the facts.

We had a gigantic undertaking on our hands; we had the whole tariff business. The country had grown in size, and the number of people who wanted to be heard was large. We heard several times as many people as ever were heard upon any other tariff bill. We took more evidence than was ever taken before. I challenge any man on that side of the House who is a candid man—and I assume that you all are candid men—to read carefully through that evidence and say that the chairman of that committee, or the majority members of it, did not try to get at the truth, no matter who appeared before them or what kind of cross-examination it required to worry the truth out of them.

Still we did not get all of it. I had made up my mind before that that if we could have notice that a revision of the tariff was coming, that the best way to gather evidence was for the Ways and Means Committee to form a sort of tariff board under their instruction and their guidance and employ experts, have the money to do it with, get the statements from all parts of the earth and tabulate them and find out what the cost was.

But we have heard a great deal of hypocritical talk about getting at the exact cost, saying that it is all different in different factories. Of course it is. It depends somewhat on the element of chance, just as it does in selling articles. The force of labor may be weak in insisting on its right, and the employer may be strong and sturdy in his position. All men are not alike in buying in the open markets. There is just as much difference between the buyer and the seller as there is between the employer and the employee, and yet we have no difficulty in getting at the market price of commodities that are sold in this country.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman recollect the extraordinary confusion that existed during the debate on the reciprocity bill wherein the different market prices in the same commodities in a chain of cities on the same parallel varied from 10 cents to 50 cents?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman was not here during the reciprocity debate, but he has some knowledge and information on the subject, and while the locality may have a different price, and it may be dear, yet there is no difficulty in getting the general price in the country, and all our market reports are founded upon the aggregation of the general market. I want to illustrate that idea a little further. I live within 7 miles of a village connected with my home city by trolley, and meats sell for from 5 to 12 cents a pound less in the village than they do in my city. The first markets in the city, the central markets, will charge for the choice cuts of meat 5 and sometimes 10 cents a pound more than you can buy them for if you go out into the outskirts where they do not have much demand for the choice cuts, where they sell the rough meat, and, on the other hand, the rough meat is in greater demand at those places in the outskirts. Of course there are differences of that kind, there are differences in the different factories in the same city, but to get the general trend of the market, to get the general trend of the prices of labor, especially where the general trend shows that the wage is twice as much in this country as in Great Britain, or three times or two and a half times as much as it is in Germany and France, is a comparatively easy matter.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. And assuming that the gentleman is correct, that you can get a general price on such a commodity as meat or we will say corn or wheat or something of which the price is fixed in a general world's market, how does that apply in ascertaining the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad of a hat or a necktie or a pair of sleeve links? In other words, the gentleman convicts his own party of having produced an unscientific theory of fixing the rates.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, we hear a great deal of bosh, and it is bosh, about a scientific adjustment of the tariff, as though you could take a pair of apothecary scales and measure out these schedules.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Is not that what your platform calls for?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Why not?

Mr. PAYNE. It does not say anything about apothecary's scales.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It says something about the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, which is a thing impossible to ascertain.

Mr. PAYNE. It certainly does say something about the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and that can be fairly ascertained; but you can not obtain it down to a mill or the fraction of a mill on a pound of stuff.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Having ascertained that difference in the cost of production here and abroad and added on a reasonable profit for the manufacturer, is not that a prohibitive tariff? In other words, what is there to induce the importation of goods?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, it simply puts our people on the same plane as those across the water. If the gentleman calls that prohibitive, he has a different idea of prohibition than I have. It is competitive. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. What is it that induces the importer in this country to import anything if we have entirely offset the difference in the cost of production here and abroad and then added on a reasonable profit for the manufacturer?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, some people will give more for some things than for another. Some people want imported goods, and they will pay a larger price than they get the home goods for. There are all sorts of inducements. You have got to go into the workings of the human mind to find out why a man wants to pay anything at one place or another. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It may be that that is true as to fancy or freak articles that some people may desire for special reasons. At the same time, are not general importations excluded by such a method of tariff adjustment?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, no. The goods will be dumped on us when they get an opportunity. We cut the duty down on shoes, and we cut it down, as the gentleman knows, as low as it ought to be, and possibly a little lower, and you come in here with your fake free-list bill and try to make a little party capital. Why, you are trying to get onto every band wagon that comes along.

When the department starts in on a trust some Member rises up and wants to investigate, and tries to appropriate a part of it to himself when the Government has done the business.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman can contain himself for a moment. Now, I have seen illustrations of that right here in this session of Congress—regiments of them. People hear something is being done and bring in resolutions to investigate. I remember the other day talking to the Attorney General, and he said he had a letter of inquiry, or something of the kind, from the House about certain matters. Why he did not prosecute a criminal in one case, and he said he wrote back that he had the parties indicted some two months ago. In the other case the question was asked why he did not prosecute, and he said suit had been commenced. You are trying to jump on the band wagon all the time. But, gentlemen, you have got to do lots of work; you have got to do some real business; you have to come out and show what your principles are that the people will recognize them as Democratic principles, and then if they approve them—your course and principles here—they will ratify you. But you are not going to carry another election on false pretenses. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Did you not develop before that committee, so far as the manufacture of boots and shoes is concerned, that the American manufacturer, if he had free hides, could compete with the world in boots and shoes.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, there were two or three gentlemen who testified to that, and, as I recollect, they all came in the next day and took it back. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. Did not one of them say that the world would be a "cinch" for the trade if you gave them free hides?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not remember any such language in reference to it. [Laughter.] But I will tell the gentleman for his consolation, if that will do just as well, that one of the manufacturers said he could compete with anything beneath the sun, as I recall the expression. I am perfectly willing to admit anything that was said, but, of course, I am not bound by what was said there. I will only admit what they said.

Mr. FOWLER. If I should read from those tariff hearings that the gentleman did say that the world would be a "cinch" it would be true that that developed in the hearings, would it not?

Mr. PAYNE. I assume the gentleman can read correctly. Yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I mean that it would not be manufactured if it is read from that report?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I will read from it in my speech, if I have the honor to make one.

Mr. PAYNE. And if I have the honor to listen when the gentleman refers to it in his speech, I will know whether it is read correctly or not. Now, Mr. Chairman, we did cut down those duties. We did not take them all off, but we gave them free hides, and what is the result to-day? Since that two years have passed the American Shoe Machinery Co., in this country, where we make the best in the world, have taken their machines to Germany and England and put them in there, and put people in there to instruct their people how to use those machines and how to make the shoes, and they have taken American lasts, and they are making shoes over there, and the factories of England have their agents here for the convincing of retail dealers of shoes in America, getting into our market, and bringing them in competition, as my colleague said, although we had tried to make up the difference between the cost there and the cost here in our tariff bill when we adjusted this duty. The trade is shrinking, and some of those people are getting alarmed about it, and none of them to-day would go in before the Ways and Means Committee and say they could stand free shoes. Most of them would try to demonstrate by facts and figures that the duty was too low now. I trust they will get along with the duty as it is. Of course they will never get the "fake free-list bill" into law, and they will not be put on the free list. That is a matter that will not come to pass, because the people do not believe in destroying the shoe industry in this country, that wonderful industry that employs so many people [applause on the Republican side]; yes—and I will say in the presence of my friend from New Jersey—brings so much happiness to the homes of the American people.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield, though not on that particular point, for a question? I would like to ask the one-time chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which considered the Payne-Aldrich law, on what principle they dealt with the file schedule? I suppose the gentleman has as much time as he desires, and therefore I will trespass on his patience and state this circumstance a little fully. I remember being in the Ways and Means Committee room when a gentleman who has a factory in my district stated that he was paying a high price for his steel rods or other raw material that he used in the manufacture of his files. He said he did not complain about that. He said he paid more than the foreigner had to pay; that he paid high wages in this country, which I from personal investigation know to be true; he does, I think, pay good wages, as wages go in the file industry; that he was then able to ship those files abroad and pay a tariff to get into the German market and there sell in competition with the under-paid labor of Germany, taking into consideration at that point the fact that the German got his raw material much cheaper. But he was demanding right at that very hearing a 200 per cent tariff upon a certain kind of file that he said he was unable to make in this country with 100 per cent duty. Now, the committee, as I remember, cut his duty in half, but still left it prohibitive, and I would like to know on what theory the Ways and Means Committee dealt with that schedule?

Mr. PAYNE. There was no 100 per cent or 200 per cent duty. The chairman of the committee learned something in reference to the matter of files from the statement that had been made, and with the permission of the committee he subpœnaed the manufacturer, and cross-examined him for a long time. He was not from the gentleman's district.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. He has a factory in my district.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that the Providence man?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes. He has a factory in my district.

Mr. PAYNE. He had a number of factories. He made his statement, and it appeared to me the duty ought to be reduced, and the committee agreed with me and they reduced it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. And still left it at a prohibitive rate though.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think it was prohibitive, because files were already brought in in quite a quantity under the former duty. The duty was not prohibitive. I want to say to the gentleman that the bill went to the Senate, and they increased the duty, and we compromised it in the conference committee.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. It is still, according to his statement, a highly prohibitive duty. And I maintain, according to the hearings before your own committee, and according to the information elicited by the gentleman from New York himself, that this man was abundantly able to compete with the cheapest file manufacturer in the world, and under the tariff was getting a much higher price in this country than he sold for in Germany.

Mr. PAYNE. He said in regard to it that he adopted the policy of hiring some college graduates and sending them to the different countries to try to get in there with files, and he had built up considerable of a trade—I do not remember how much, but not a very large one, but a considerable one—and that the expense of selling was so great that he could not get his files in there and make anything. That was the gist of his evidence on that.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you will permit me, my recollection is that the record will show that he stated that what he was selling abroad he was selling at a loss.

Mr. PAYNE. He said it had not been profitable. I have not looked at that evidence for two years, and I can not state definitely about it. It is difficult to recall just what the facts were. The gentleman refers to that law as the Payne-Aldrich law. I think I ought to say right here it was named the Payne-Aldrich law because it was known that the Senator from Rhode Island was in favor of a higher scale of duties than the "gentleman from New York," the chairman of the committee, and that was done in view of the general talk all over the country to in every way possible throw suspicion upon the bill itself. If I may say so, I was intimately connected with three tariff bills—the McKinley, the Dingley, and the present law—and the Senate made less inroads on the bill as it left the House—I mean the present law—than they did either on the McKinley or the Dingley law. It is due to the committee of the House and to the House conferees to say that much. So far as I am concerned myself, I do not care a little bit. But if I could get the people to understand and read the record of that law, as I shall present it later on, that would be the height of my ambition.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I think that everybody is willing to admit that if the gentleman from New York had been permitted to have his own way we would have had a much better tariff law than the present one. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I thank the gentleman for his compliment and I hope he is right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why was this 20 per cent duty put on wool in violation of the platform and policy of the Democratic Party? There must have been some reason for it. Why was it? Is Mr. Bryan right about it? Does any man dare say he is not right about it? Why, I see my distinguished friend, the Speaker, is here. [Laughter and applause.] I think I will say it, now that he is here—I would not say it in his absence—that I have been looking over the census reports on sheep, and I find that while the number of sheep and lambs in the United States has fallen off 0.0312 per cent, yet in Missouri the number has doubled. Of course, I understand the sheep have been driven down there from States farther west because of failure of pastures, but the failure seems to be owing largely to the fact that the upper countries are being divided up and put into forest reserves, and all that sort of thing, and they are not available longer for pastures. The farmers of Missouri, always interested in wool, are getting more and more interested, and this year they are more interested than they have ever been.

Missouri has gotten into the habit of voting the Republican ticket occasionally. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I do not know whether the sheep are allowed to vote there or not. They have been electing Republican governors in Missouri, and if they did not put all the Republican majority in one district, and if there was a fair distribution of districts, the Republicans would elect a majority of the delegation from Missouri to this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Right you are!

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, I am not going to accuse the Speaker [laughter]——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he can point out as great a discrepancy in population between any two districts in Missouri as the discrepancy, in proportion, between two New York districts, one of which has 125,000 people and another 375,000, the districts being adjoining?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman now is coming to a State where there has been the most phenomenal increase of population, in certain districts of it, of any State in the Union or any country of the world. The gentleman is talking about some New York districts, New York City districts, some uptown districts, which have been settled up in the last 10 years, as my friend from New York [Mr. HARRISON] will not deny, and it is unfair to compare them with the districts in the State of Missouri. Why, I remember my friend said once that he did not believe in gerrymandering, but that if people were going at it, his own State had the most scientific job done in it that was ever done in that direction. [Laughter.] And he will not deny it now that they did that job, although he may not recollect what he said on that occasion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say what I said about gerrymandering, and I will say it now—that it is an unfortunate habit [laughter and applause]——

Mr. PAYNE. That is putting it mildly enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me make a complete statement. It is a thing that everybody condemns in theory and favors in practice. [Applause and laughter.] I think we would be better off everywhere if it were abolished; but we are not going to abolish it until human nature is transformed and purified. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman a moment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I acquit the distinguished Speaker of any guilt in the gerrymandering of the Missouri districts. But if what he says is true, if it requires a change of human nature to change that system of gerrymandering which has been practiced, I am frank to admit, by both political parties—both of them are guilty of unfair gerrymandering in the United States—would it not be well for us to make a law which would enable the people in the several States to apportion the districts themselves? In other words, if in each State of the Union the Republicans and the Democrats would be obliged to submit to the voters a fair scheme of apportionment, we could be reasonably sure that that scheme would be a good one, because both parties would know that the people would have to pass upon it, and then it would not make much difference whether the Republican or the Democratic scheme was adopted by the people. They would be reasonably sure of having a good apportionment. That was the point we made in connection with that discussion some weeks ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You made the point simply because you happened to have the advantage of having an accidental governor at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. We are getting away from the tariff proposition. The sight of the genial face of my friend from Missouri caused me to raise the inquiry and to wonder why it was that they put a duty on wool. I remember that in my early days in this House Mr. Samuel S. Cox, known to fame as "Sunset" Cox, was making a speech one day on the question of the tariff of 1883. He was a free trader and for free wool in principle. He was asked if he did not go through Ohio and make speeches in favor of a tariff on wool at the election succeeding the Democratic tariff of 1883, which cut it down. He said no, he did not do anything of the kind, but he said he went through the district and told the people that every time he met a sheep the sheep would say, "Ba! ba! John Sherman. Ba! ba!" And I did not know but my friend was afraid that the sheep might get after him in Missouri if he did not consent to a little bit of a duty of 20 per cent on wool as a sop to the farmers who own the sheep; but he shakes his head, and of course I take it for granted that that never entered his thought. [Laughter.]

Now, the duty on wool is 20 per cent. The duty on woolen cloth is 40 per cent, and on clothing 45 per cent, and on cloth with cotton backing I think it is 40 per cent in this bill. Sixty-five per cent of the cost of cloth is wool. If you put a duty of 40 per cent on cloth, something must come out of it for the protection you put on wool. If the wool is worth 65 per cent, 20 per cent of that will be 13 per cent on the cloth for the wool duty; and you must deduct that 13 per cent from the duty which you have put on the cloth, which would leave 27 per cent in the one instance and a lower percentage in the other.

In the Wilson bill they put wool on the free list, but they put a higher percentage on the manufactured article than you do, all through their bill. There was not anything to be taken out as a compensatory duty for the wool in the cloth.

What effect will this bill have on the manufacture of cloth? You say in your report that it will increase the importation of cloth nearly threefold—from $23,057,357.78 in value to $63,831,000.

I think you are right about it. I think this reduction of duty will have that effect. Now, if you do that, you will bring in here 85,000,000 pounds more of wool, in the form of cloth, than you bring in now. What effect will that have upon the Missouri sheep and lambs, and the sheep and lambs in the rest of the country? You say that you will increase the importation of wool by over 100,000,000 pounds in order to get your revenue. You say this in the bill that you printed for the caucus. I suppose that was the argument in the caucus, if it contained any argument; but it does not. The argument is expressed in the resolution that you put through in the caucus. What effect will the importation of 185,000,000 pounds of wool into this country—raw and in the cloth—under your bill have upon the domestic production of wool in this country? How will sheep be affected? On an average, we produce about 300,000,000 pounds of wool in this country. It has run up as high as 317,000,000 pounds. One hundred and eighty-five million pounds taken from that would be not quite 65 per cent displaced by this increased importation of foreign wool. If I had figured it close, it would have been 65 per cent, because I have figured in some of the cloths and other articles at the wholesale, while I let tops and noils and shoddy, and so forth, some of it go.

What effect is that going to have on the production of sheep in this country? What effect did the Wilson bill have?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does not the gentleman recollect that the actual per capita consumption of wool is about 20 per cent less in this country than it was 20 years ago?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not recollect the exact percentage. I do know it is less. I know people are wearing cotton underclothing, not because they can not afford to buy woolen, but from choice. I have not worn any woolen underclothing for 15 years. I got what I supposed was linen, and wore that for several years. I was told it was cotton. I told them it was all right if it was cotton; I was going to wear that for the reason that in our northern climate when a man goes into a warm room with woolen underclothing on he perspires, and when he goes out he is liable to catch cold. As a matter of health, a great many people are wearing underclothing in which there is no wool.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman a leading question about the very thing he is talking about. Suppose the effect of this bill, if it becomes a law, were to reduce the cost to the consumer of woolen goods 25 or 30 per cent. Does not the gentleman believe that the increased consumption of woolen goods in the United States would be so great that we would use up more wool than we are now producing and importing?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not; I do not know how the gentleman with a sanguine mind can expect it is going to reduce the cost of clothing 25 per cent when so little of the cost of clothing is due to the wool it contains, and much less in duty on the wool. The cost is nearly all in the trimming, the tailoring, the sewing, and so forth.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman believe that cutting down the tariff, as this bill does, on wool would have the ultimate effect of reducing the cost of woolen things to the consumer?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the difference in the cost of clean wool ready to be used in making tops and noils, and so forth, to manufacture into woolen cloths in this country is $2.30 for a suit of clothes and in England $1.12. There is a difference of about $1.19 in favor of the low price in London over this country. That $1.19 is not going to make any difference of 25 per cent on a $12 suit or a $25 suit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman believe that the figures he has given would be a fair measure of the difference of cost between a $12 suit of clothes with this tariff on?

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say that I figured on that before the present law was passed, and I noticed that after it was passed, as the gentleman from Missouri did, that where we reduced the duties the most there was the least reduction in the price of goods. It was all absorbed by the retailer or the wholesaler.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. May not that result have been brought about by the fact that many of these things are controlled by combinations or trusts or gentlemen's agreements, or whatever you are pleased to call them?

Mr. PAYNE. It might be if you are going to draw on your imagination, but I always want some tangible evidence.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from New York and I agreed to take the tariff off hides. Both of us helped do that, and the promise was made that shoes would go down 25 or 50 cents a pair. I would like to get hold of that crowd that came down here and promised that. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I am sorry that the gentleman was fooled; they did not fool me, for I did not believe a word of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this question: When we did take the tariff off hides, does not the gentleman believe that the price of leather and shoes would have gone down, as the makers swore they would go down, if it had not been controlled by the Leather Trust and that gang that runs the trust in the machinery for making shoes?

Mr. PAYNE. The hide business was getting into the control of the packers of beef. They cut off the market for the local tanneries, especially in Pennsylvania and States between there and Chicago, and they were tanning the hides of the cattle themselves and also of the tanners. The tanners could not get hold of any hides with the duty on them; they went to Germany, and Germany made the leather. We did not get a look-in at all for the local tanners, and some tanners, in despair, had rented their tanneries to some Chicago packers, and the business we were losing entirely, except what was being done by the Meat Trust. There seems to be evidence that there is such a thing as a Meat Trust. One of my strong reasons for taking off the duty on hides—and I was against the duty 20 years ago, because the duty was of no benefit to the farmer whatever—but my strong reason for being anxious to take it off was to get at the people in Chicago. I never had any idea that it would do what they claimed. I told those gentleman if they could save the whole tariff it would amount to but 2½ or 3 cents on a pair of shoes; and I said to them, What is the use of your coming up here and making this pretense that it would save 25 or 50 cents a pair?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is true, is it not, that the Massachusetts shoemakers, and others—I believe there were some of our St. Louis friends mixed up in it—did come before the Ways and Means Committee and swear that if we put hides on the free list shoes would go down 25 to 50 cents a pair, and they explained to us that shoes did not go down or up 5 cents a pair, or 10 cents a pair, or 15 cents a pair, or 20, or 30, or 35, or 40, or 45 cents a pair, but they went up and down by quarters?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I think Mr. Jones, of Boston, stated that at least, and I do not remember the others.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And Jones stated it and elaborated it, and then cut it out, but the others did, too.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not Jones take that back the next day?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not the next day, but about a week afterwards, after my good friend, Hon. AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER, got after him up in Massachusetts and sandbagged him or did something to him [laughter]—I do not know what it was—but Jones did come back and retract part of that, and Mr. GARDNER's contention was, to be fair to him, that Jones's statement might be all right for fine shoes, and lightweight shoes, but that it would be ruinous to brogan-shoe makers and the heavy shoes; that they could not stand it. That was Mr. GARDNER's contention about it from the first, and he stuck to it until the last.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Albert Clarke, of Boston, came before the committee the next day after Jones made the statement and said Jones had retracted it before he left the room after making it. I sent for Jones, and he appeared about a week later and retracted the statement. I think the heavy-shoe makers were in more danger than the fine-shoe makers at that time. Since that time conditions have changed, recently, by reason of the American machinery having been taken over to Europe and the people being instructed there to make fine shoes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Was there not evidence before that Ways and Means Committee that this crowd that controls the shoemaking machines constituted as tight a trust as there is on the face of the earth?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know how tight the trusts are, but it was my idea that it was a trust.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the gentleman heard anything of Attorney General Wickersham jumping on that trust?

Mr. PAYNE. No; and I am sorry to say that I never have called his attention to that evidence, so I think I am as much to blame as the Attorney General is, as is also the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, I am not a prosecuting officer. If I were, I would shut them up before six months elapsed.

Mr. PAYNE. And I am not either, but when I discover a trust I think it is my duty to notify the people who prosecute, as it is also the duty of the gentleman from Missouri. I know and the gentleman knows, for he has been a prosecuting attorney as well as I have, that the prosecuting attorney does not know always what is going on, and it is only by people telling him, and then he must prosecute, and if he does not, he is to blame.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, returning to the subject of wool, supposing the gentleman's contention is correct, and we will not get all the reduction in the price of clothes that we hope from reducing this duty on raw wool—that is, assuming certain grades of clothes will still continue to be sold at the standard prices—does not the gentleman believe that by reducing the duty on raw wool and making it easier for our manufacturers to get more real wool, clothes would be made out of wool instead of out of substitutes?

Mr. PAYNE. Now, I fear the gentleman has brought up another question. The Wilson bill, of which I was about to speak when I was interrupted, put shoddy on the free list, and rags and every abominable thing of that kind. Shoddy came over here in immense quantities and substituted itself for wool. Every pound of shoddy was a substitute for a pound of scoured wool. Shoddy, to a certain extent, is legitimate to put in manufactured clothing, but if too much is put in, the cloth is good for nothing, and in trying to compete with the shoddy goods that came in from Great Britain our manufacturers then did make a good many shoddy goods, and we had a good many of them, and millions of pounds of importations came in under the Wilson bill. Now, when we came to make the Dingley bill we put a duty on shoddy that we believed was prohibitive, and we did it purposely, 15 cents a pound, which is more than 100 per cent, and it did stop the importation of shoddy. There were only a few pounds came in. Some ignorant fellow imported a few pounds and ran up against the law, in all human probability. They could not import shoddy. We had a good deal of shoddy manufactured here in our own mills, and from the rags that came from clothing here.

It is a saving when legitimately used; but, while it is an advantage, it displaced the wool. But the difficulty is that they put too much of it in and make the warp and the woof—and especially the warp—of shoddy, and that makes a very weak thread and a suit of clothes that is an imposition on any poor man who buys it. I remember when we had a wool discussion up once—I think it was when the Dingley bill was under consideration—and Jeremiah Simpson, of Kansas, the man who won immortal fame while here in the House, came in with a suit of clothes he had bought, taken from the back of a Virginia farmer, as he said. I do not know whether Jerry would know a Virginia farmer from a hobo, but he said he got it from the back of a Virginia farmer. He brought it in here and he tore it up. It ripped easily, and he wanted to know what kind of a suit of clothes that was for an American farmer to wear. Of course, there was only one opinion about the suit of clothes, but it encouraged me to try to stop the use of this shoddy in this country so far as I could, so that there would not be a temptation to put so much of it in a suit of clothes as that one had, so that mainly the shoddy thread ran both ways, with only a little wool to hold it together.

That was a practical illustration I had of shoddy. That was a specimen of the miserably poor goods that were made under the Wilson law with the unlimited importation of shoddy, which was free.

But we put a prohibitive duty on shoddy. We thought there was enough produced in this country to meet all the legitimate demands of the manufacturers, and the result has proved that we were right.

In a circular recently issued, the firm of E. H. Van Ingen & Co., woolen importers, long conspicuous for the handling especially of English goods, says of the quality of the product of American mills:

> There are no more expert manufacturers anywhere than the best of those in this country. They are wonderfully quick to catch ideas, to modify, alter, improve, and to meet quickly the ever-changing demands of fashion and fancy. They produce as great a variety of woolen cloths as can be found in the whole of Europe together. The fine and medium grade of woolen cloths made here are generally better than those of equal quality to be obtained in any other country. American colors are, as a rule, better, clearer, and more lasting than those of similar foreign-made fabrics. The designing talent in America is quite equal to any in Europe.

This circular adds that only in the relatively small quantities of the finest and costliest cloths bought and used by a few very wealthy people has Europe any advantage over the United States—

> But in sound medium grades Americans are not only better, but much cheaper than similar foreign goods of the same qualities.

This means, of course, that the American goods are cheaper as compared with the foreign fabrics, duty paid. The tribute to American manufacturing is the more significant as coming from a firm that favors lower duties in the interest of a large use of British cloths—the object of the circular quoted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask my friend one more question.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does it happen, if this tariff in your bill and the bill of your predecessor is such a good thing, that while the number of the people in the United States has about doubled since 1880 that the number of sheep has absolutely diminished, being 42,192,000 shearing sheep in 1880, 40,876,000 in 1890, 39,853,000 in 1900, and only 39,039,000 in 1910?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I think I can answer the gentleman to his satisfaction. The great falling off between 1880 and 1900, the greatest falling off was during the three years we ran under the Wilson bill, and if the gentleman pursues these statistics a little further he will find the great falling off——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but the trouble about that is—I will restate the figures. It was 42,000,000——

Mr. PAYNE. I was going to answer the gentleman's question in regard to the falling off and I was speaking of the greatest cause——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was 42,000,000 in 1880, 38,000,000 in 1890, thirty-nine millions and some odd thousands in 1900, and only 39,039,000 in 1910, so it has been going down under those two last tariff bills.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, to finish my answer, if the gentleman is through repeating his question, there is no doubt, as the gentleman knows fully as well as I do, if not better, that there has been a great change in the area where sheep can be raised and grazed in this country owing to the settling up of the country by small farmers. They can not have large flocks; they have small flocks, comparatively, even over in Texas, as I understand it to-day. My friend who stands there will correct me if I am wrong. It is the same in the States and Territories. The land has been withdrawn for forest reservations and conservation and like things and there is not that free range that there was prior to 1880 or 1890 over the country. The people have to pay rent for the land to the United States, and they have to do some fencing which they never had to do before, and that has been the great cause of the falling off of the flocks.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion——

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado (continuing). To the question asked by the gentleman from Missouri, the Speaker. Do not you realize that we have been eating more mutton from year to year; that since the time the Speaker mentioned we have trebled the number of mutton slaughtered, and the last year it was sixteen or seventeen million sheep we ate over the period of time the Speaker mentioned; it is about two-thirds more.

Mr. PAYNE. That is true as the gentleman says, and in the Rocky Mountain States also they have been slaughtering lambs to a large extent in the last few years. That has increased.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is true, is not it also true, then, that those people do not raise the sheep for the wool, but that they raise them for mutton?

Mr. PAYNE. They raise some sheep for the mutton and wool. They can not raise sheep in Ohio for the wool itself; the land is too high. I doubt whether they can do it in the gentleman's State.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman they can not do it in our State.

Mr. PAYNE. In the course of 10 years that land will be so high they can not anywhere.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman this question in order to get at the very philosophy and root of the whole business: Is it not true in your State and my State, and every other State, that when the price of land goes up the number of sheep diminishes, and that you can not raise sheep either for mutton or for wool at a profit on high-priced land?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think they can raise sheep and throw away the wool and sell the sheep for mutton, or throw away the mutton and sell the wool. I do not think they can do that anywhere. I think on the high-priced land they need both the mutton and the wool to help out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly the statement of the gentleman from Missouri is not true as to Ohio, because there are substantially the same number of sheep there to-day as there were 10 or 15 years ago, and the average price of farm land has increased probably three times.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I will ask the gentleman from Ohio, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will yield, if it is not true that the sheep industry, principally in Ohio, has been driven into the hill or rough land down next to the Ohio River?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think that is true. I think that the sheep industry in Ohio still remains as it always has, a very diversified industry, conducted in almost all counties. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] the other day published in his speech a record of the number of sheep in all counties in Ohio, and the gentleman can find from that how that situation is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio another question while he is on his feet. How does it happen that in Ohio in 1880 there were 4,903,000 sheep and in 1910 there were only 2,998,000, a falling off of nearly one-half? These are official statistics.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not understand it is true that there are less than 3,000,000 sheep in Ohio to-day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Ohio would not contradict the figures of a Republican administration?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is a great question as to where those figures have been procured.

Mr. HELGESEN. If the gentleman will excuse me, I have some figures which I obtained from the Census Bureau yesterday, and which have not been published. They were sent to me privately. They show that Ohio has 3,975,000 sheep.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask you, since you are volunteering the information, if that does not include lambs?

Mr. HELGESEN. It includes the total number of sheep.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But I am referring to shearing sheep.

Mr. PAYNE. It excludes all lambs under a year old.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, taking the gentleman's own figures, how does it happen that the number of shearing sheep in Ohio fell off from 4,903,000 in 1880 to 2,998,000 in 1910?

Mr. HELGESEN. The gentleman says that as land goes up the number of sheep will decrease. If he will look at the latest figures from the Census Department for Missouri—and I imagine land in Missouri is going up—he will find the total number of sheep 10 years ago was 1,087,213, while in 1910 the total number was 1,808,038, an increase of nearly three-quarters of a million. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no sort of trouble about explaining that statement. A vast amount of wild lands in the mountainous part of Missouri has been opened up in recent years. Government land has been entered, and lands owned in large tracts have been cut up, and men have gone in there, and in the part of the State where the wool industry flourishes the most the number of sheep has increased. And it carries out what I have said all the time about this business, that, for some reason I have never been able to understand, as the price of land goes up the number of sheep diminishes. They raise a good many sheep in my part of Missouri, a very rich agricultural part, lying down between the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. But they are fine sheep. We ship them to the West and to the Northwest and to the South, and sell them at fancy prices for breeding purposes. And I do not believe, in the eight counties in my district, north of the Missouri River, there is a single scrub sheep, unless it has been imported in there for feeding purposes. Now, in the two counties south of the river there may be a few, because those counties extend to the foothills of the Ozarks. The thousands of sheep brought into Missouri to fatten, and which stay there only a few weeks, are all counted in the official figures. Most probably they are counted twice—once in Missouri, where they are fattened, and once in the Western States, where they were raised.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, as the value of land goes up the number of sheep would diminish, because it would cost more there to raise the sheep.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, why is that? The number of hogs does not diminish; the number of cattle does not diminish; the number of horses and mules does not diminish as the value of the land increases.

Mr. PAYNE. Because it is more profitable to go into some other branch of industry on the farm than sheep raising.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. PAYNE. I will in a few moments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Missouri is looking for the figures he wants, will he permit me to read some figures on the wool industry during the life of the Wilson bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The number of sheep fell off during the life of the Wilson bill; but it has fallen off under the Dingley bill, too, and under the blessed Payne bill. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will realize that in speaking of Ohio, Ohio was hit harder than any other State in the Union by the Wilson bill. The gentleman from Missouri will remember that the number of sheep fell off in less than three years from substantially 4,000,000 to not much more than 1,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The number of sheep in Ohio?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; Ohio.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to cut off this joint debate after a little while.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will give the gentleman a rest [laughter]; but, first, I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio about that hill-country business. Is not Cadiz, Ohio, just about the center of the wool industry in Ohio?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not answer that question positively.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am afraid I know more about Ohio than the gentleman does. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am afraid the gentleman from Missouri does not know as much about the effect of free wool upon Ohio sheep as I do. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman this question. In the year 1860 Ohio had 3,160,000 sheep; in 1870, 4,929,000; and in 1880, 4,903,000; while in 1890, now that you are talking about the calamitous Wilson bill, they had 4,061,000——

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was before the enactment of the Wilson bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; that was after the Wilson bill. In 1880 Ohio had 4,903,000 sheep, and——

Mr. LONGWORTH. And in 1890 how many?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In 1890 it had 4,061,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And in 1897?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My figures here do not give the number in 1897. Yes; in 1900 it was 2,648,000——

Mr. LONGWORTH. According to the gentleman's figures, as to the authenticity of which I do not know——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are Treasury figures——

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Missouri must admit that the number fell off in less than three years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know that; but what I am talking and contending about is that they fall off under any tariff bill. In 1890 there were 4,000,000; in 1900 there were 2,648,000 sheep in Ohio; and now, after 15 years of a high tariff, the gentleman has in Ohio only 2,839,000 sheep.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, but the gentleman heard the correct figures read a moment ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but——

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is practically 4,000,000. It is 3,900,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. These are the shearing sheep; and those figures that the gentleman read included the lambs.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, they are wool sheep in both sets of figures. The gentleman made the positive statement that——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I must insist to the gentlemen that I be allowed to close sometime this afternoon.

Mr. HELGESEN. Here are the figures of the wool-producing sheep——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I insist that if the gentleman from New York cuts us out, he ought also to cut out the gentleman from North Dakota. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. My genial friend from Missouri knows that it is difficult to secure time, but if there is anything that he wants to recur to after this gentleman has finished, I will give him time.

Mr. HELGESEN. In Ohio in 1910 the number of sheep and lambs was 3,907,055. In 1900 the number was 4,020,628. That is, in 1910 there were 113,673 less than 10 years before.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman from New York one more question.

Mr. PAYNE. I shall warn the gentlemen who are carrying on this joint debate in my time that I will strike all their figures out of the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does it happen that the shearing sheep throughout the United States in 1903 were 63,105,000, and in 1904 they had fallen off to 51,630,000? That is a fact that needs explanation on the gentleman's theory.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Missouri is reading something now that appeared in an Agricultural Yearbook a few years ago and not in the United States census reports.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman surely is not going to dispute about the statistics that the Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, gives out. He is the most reliable Republican functionary who has been here since I have been in Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman assumes that everything a Republican functionary does and says is the exact truth. Well, that is a very reasonable conclusion, but they can not get an estimate of the sheep in this country that will be exact. The census may get pretty close to it. It is like the price of mutton.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to go back to the effect of the Wilson bill on the consumption of wool in this country, and so forth, a question that agitated my friend from Illinois yesterday. In 1896 there were carried over from the previous year 194,000,000 pounds of wool; American clip, 272,000,000; imports, 159,000,000; imports of shoddy, noils, rags, and so forth, 17,000,000 pounds; total supply, 643,000,000 pounds; consumption and exports, 250,000,000 pounds; carried over at the end of the year, 393,000,000 pounds.

In 1897 there was less wool produced and the imports were double, and the importations of shoddy, and so forth, increased from 17,000,000 pounds to 44,500,000 pounds under the Wilson bill. The total supply was 1,254,000,000 pounds and the amount carried over was 794,000,000. I will put this table in the RECORD in full. In the year 1898, 761,000,000 pounds were carried over, and in 1899, 589,494,000; in 1900, 494,000,000, and in 1901, 396,000,000 pounds were carried over; in 1902, 314,000,000 pounds; and in 1903, 286,000,000 pounds.

The visible supply of wool—the wool that was not used—increased to nearly 1,000,000,000 pounds during the Wilson bill period, but finally got down to between 200,000,000 and 300,000,000 pounds under the duties of the Dingley bill. I suggest that to the gentleman from Illinois, because I think he had a slightly mistaken idea about it. I understand he is going to make a speech to-day, and I would prefer to have him make it in his own time and not in mine, unless it is absolutely necessary. Here is the table referred to:

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, for a question.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask for information—what does the Bureau of Statistics of the Agricultural Department mean by the total consumption in the column headed "Total consumption" for certain years?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know anything about what that means or what the report is.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not that mean that the consumption was so much during that year?

Mr. PAYNE. You will have to ask the Secretary of Agriculture what he means by it, if he said so.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, I will ask you if it is not a fact that during the panics that have occurred in America the foreign importation of wool was the greatest, compared with the other years?

Mr. PAYNE. Which panic does the gentleman refer to, the panic of 1857 that followed the Walker bill or the panic of 1893 and 1896?

Mr. FOWLER. I refer to the panic of 1872 and the panic of the early nineties.

Mr. PAYNE. I have not looked back at the statistics of 1872. The early nineties did not show a greater importation of wool, but 1893-6-7-8 did.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask you if it is not a fact that the per cent that was imported from foreign countries in 1872 was not 45 per cent of the consumption?

Mr. PAYNE. I am not able to answer the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. FOWLER. Was not that the greatest foreign importation for any year prior to that, or any year subsequent to that, until the panic of the nineties?

Mr. PAYNE. I want simply to say to the gentleman that I have read the official figures and I will put them in the RECORD.

He can study them there. I am not going to try to hold any school on the subject any further.

Mr. FOWLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon for one more question, and that is all.

Mr. PAYNE. All right.

Mr. FOWLER. You said that the greatest falling off in the number of sheep was during the Wilson bill. Now, I will ask you if during the time from 1870 to 1872 there was not a falling off of more than 9,000,000 head of sheep?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not carry the statistics of the last 50 years in my mind. I know there was some falling off on account of the tariff of 1883.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask you if there was not a falling off of more than 2,000,000 head during the panic of the early seventies than the biggest falling off during the operation of the Wilson bill?

Mr. PAYNE. That was not in the early nineties.

Mr. FOWLER. The Wilson bill was in the early nineties.

Mr. PAYNE. It began in July, 1894, and continued for three years.

Mr. FOWLER. I will now ask the gentleman——

Mr. PAYNE. I can not yield to the gentleman further.

Mr. FOWLER. For one more question.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman has said that three times. I can not allow my time to be used up in that way, and I do not think the gentleman ought to impose on me.

Mr. FOWLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not mean to impose on him.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, not only the sheep disappeared and wool was carried over, but the machinery was idle. I refer, gentlemen, to page 5406 of the hearings upon wool two years ago. In 1896 42 per cent of the woolen machinery in this country was idle; 43 per cent of the woolen mills was idle; 47 per cent of the knitting machinery was idle; 53 per cent of the knitting mills was idle. You go into the kindred industry, the cotton industry, and I think 57 per cent of the mills was idle. It not only caused the slaughter of the sheep, but it caused the stoppage of the mills, and I think gentlemen may be mistaken in regard to this bill. Goods will come in, they will get the revenue, they will get within a million and a half dollars of the present revenue, but they will stop the mills and send the price of sheep down from $4 to $1.70, and, perhaps, to 50 cents, as they did in 1896. Gentlemen may doubt that statement; and still it was testified to by men who appeared honest and credible, men in the sheep business. One man told about buying 3,000 or 4,000 sheep at 50 cents a head in 1896 under the Wilson bill, and he kept them until after the Dingley bill went into effect and made a small fortune. He took his chances; it was a speculation; but he made his money.

Even a woman came before the committee and testified to her recollection of what occurred in Idaho in regard to the sheep industry during the perilous years of the Wilson bill.

Now, you gentlemen had all these facts before you. You pretend to say that you do not know what is the difference between the cost of wool and woolens in this country and countries abroad. Here is something that will furnish you a lesson on the subject, and that is the greater protection on woolens that was in the Wilson bill flooded the country with woolen goods and struck down the machinery. Free sheep stopped the growth of the sheep industry and reduced the number during the years of the Wilson bill. I believe myself, Mr. Chairman, that we have got somewhere near the limit of sheep raising in this country. Possibly by increasing the weight of the fleece, as they have been doing, from 3 pounds up to 6 or 7 pounds in later years, it may have some tendency to revive the industry; possibly by crossbreeding they may get sheep that more nearly answer the double purpose of producing wool, producing mutton and lamb, and that may help the industry. But at this time, when the number of sheep is not increasing, when the industry is not growing stronger under the present tariff, it is mighty poor policy to cut all the protection out from under it and leave it to languish and die.

You gentlemen can not excuse yourselves by saying that the caucus did it and that you got the best terms possible. They send people here to stand up and vote for what they believe. They expect to send men here with backbone. You can not tell them you got a beggarly 20 per cent on wool. They will tell you it will not do; they can not raise sheep; they will tell you that they can not maintain the flock, and they will look around for a man that has a little backbone when they send him to Congress.

Talk about protection being local to the district, and all that sort of thing. People at home have some rights to be represented in their districts. I do not know what I got for my district in making the last tariff bill, except that one little industry that employed 100 men was driven to the wall by the low duty that I put into it. Most of them voted against me in the last election. I did it because it was right, and I would do it again under similar circumstances. Some of the more intelligent ones who have studied the question concluded that I was right and still voted for me, notwithstanding the great temptation to do otherwise. I only speak of this as an illustration, and men are a good deal the same all over the country.

You can not fool all of the people all of the time. You may fool all of the people a part of the time, but not all of the people all of the time. You have got to give them something tangible and reasonable when you make a wool bill, and not go to them, as you will have to, with the confession that you did not know what effect the bill would have on the industry; that you had no knowledge that you had voted for an appropriation of $250,000 within the last four months to get the light and to get the information, but the exigencies of party politics, as you understood them, would not permit you to wait until next December, the time when you ordered by your vote the investigation and the report to be made, and that under the whip and spur of a party caucus you had to do it now, with your great leader protesting against it, and many of you protesting against it in secret, but not openly. Oh, how are you going to excuse yourselves? Why ruin a great business and a great industry? If the duty is too high, lower it, but do it intelligently. If the protection is too great, remove part of it, but do it intelligently. Do not guess at it. Do not put on a duty that is much less for manufactured goods than under the Wilson bill, when the mills were closed. Have a care! The day of reckoning is coming. Election is only a year from this fall. We will be there and you will be there, and we will do our part of the fighting. We will stir them up by way of remembrance about what you did. We will tell the people how you lost your opportunities. We will tell them how you went back on your policies. We will tell them that this bill is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, but simply a carelessly drawn and negligently made bill—to allow a great business of over $400,000,000 to be slaughtered in the supposed interest of party success.

But, gentlemen, I am spending more time on this than I expected to. There is something else I wanted to talk about, and that is the present tariff law. [Applause on the Republican side.] I know you all want to hear this. There is nothing about it that I am not willing to talk about from the enacting clause to the repealing clause at the end of it. I can maintain that it is just what the President said in his speech, the best tariff law ever enacted. One thing it had in it that rendered it better than the previous laws was putting the imports from the Philippine Islands on the free list.

You say it is a small matter, a side issue. It was a great matter, however, to 9,000,000 of people living over there under our flag who desired the privilege of the American markets. It was a great matter to them. It built them up; not only built up their schools and added to their intelligence, but it has given them more money and more hope for the future. They are making homes down there, and they are becoming every day more fit for citizenship. We took them against their will, and we are holding them partially against their will for their own good, as we believe and are able to demonstrate. They came to us by accident, not by preconceived design, and some of the best work that I have ever done in Congress has been in connection with the Committee on Insular Affairs, trying to devise means to help out the people in these insular possessions that came to us. The best part of it is this bill putting on the free list the products of the Philippine Islands. You must admit that is an improvement over former bills at least.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we paid more attention to the definite and technical language of the bill than was ever observed in any other tariff bill that has been passed. It is a great improvement on them all in this respect. That took time and thought and study—study of the decisions made under all of the tariff bills—for we believed it was most important when you imposed duties that everyone who imported should pay the same duty that his neighbors paid for the similar importation of goods, and should not escape by anything that could be misconstrued even, and the result has shown the wisdom of the course, because the bill has been more easily interpreted than any former bills.

We provided a Customs Court, and once in awhile I see a gentleman who simply knows that there is a Customs Court and that it has cost some money and will cost more, and he sneers at it. Before that, suit could be brought in any circuit court of the United States, and there were diverse decisions on the same class of cases in the different courts of the United States, and then they had to go up to the Supreme Court—a question of no great importance as a question of law, but involving much in the way of revenue—to have it reviewed there. We placed it in the power of a court which should have the final say on the subject of all these cases, no matter where they arose, in any part of the United States, and deprived all other courts of jurisdiction.

We improved on all the former bills in this respect. My friend from Missouri has gone out. He knows that I spent much time on the valuation clause and the perfecting of that clause; that because there was no sale but only a consignment of certain articles, which were not sold in open market where produced, we could not establish any foreign market price on which to levy an ad valorem duty. We put in a provision fixing the value in such cases from the selling price here, making proper deductions for expenses in transportation of the articles, landing them on the wharfs in New York in order to determine the cost of the goods abroad; I remember the gentleman from Missouri saying at one meeting of the committee that, if I could accomplish that, I would accomplish the greatest result that had ever been attained in making any tariff in the United States. Well, I got the clause in. There have not been many cases arising under it. The importers seem to be afraid of it, but now they supply the figures they would not supply before as to the cost of the goods abroad and the prices where before they had no prices. It is one of the minor points of the bill, perhaps, but one which your Speaker thought was an important point at the time. Now, you are making an ad valorem, the very worst class of duty that there is. Why, no Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, except Robert J. Walker, ever advocated an ad valorem. Your last Secretary, Mr. Daniel Manning, of my own State, who filled the position as ably, perhaps, as any man who occupied it, made a long report against this ad valorem duty business and quoted the former Secretaries, and that has been the universal feeling of men of experience who have tried the enforcement of ad valorem duties; that they occasion frauds, and we ought to have specific duties. England, Germany, France, Spain, all the great commercial nations of the world have specific duties and not ad valorem, where it is possible to have them. We have been increasing the number of specific duties in the tariff bills we have passed. It has been our policy to make a specific duty wherever we could. Sometimes, of course, you put a duty by the pound and it will result in a large ad valorem on the low-priced goods and a small ad valorem on the high-priced, and we have sought to avoid all such cases as that. We have in former laws and in this law added to the specific duties, and we have improved in that respect over other tariff bills ever passed in the United States. Oh, Germany is said to have an ideal tariff law. They make their duties specific.

From principle and because of our experience we put a maximum and minimum clause in this bill, and that was an improvement on all former bills ever passed in the United States. It had been adopted by every great commercial country in the world. They have driven sharp bargains under it, some of them. We were getting the worst end of the business; we had nothing to offer them. They would give us the worst of it every time, and our rivals got the better of us. We put in the maximum and minimum rate of duty, and that has stood the test of time, and has enabled the Executive to get our goods into foreign ports at a lower rate of duty than ever before. In many cases we have the best rates, or as good as any other country, and in some cases where there are treaties we have not got as good, but we have increased our exports by reason of this clause in the bill. Last year, for the fiscal year 1910, we had a billion and a half exports; it was larger than we ever had. This year we have now for 11 months up to the 1st of June the largest exports ever in any 11 months in any year. If they keep on to the end of this month the exports for this fiscal year will be over $2,000,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] Orators stand on the street corners braying to the tune of the Democratic donkey, and saying, "The worst bill ever passed; the most iniquitous tariff bill ever passed; the most outrageous bill ever passed." I wish we had all of you here, I would like to give you a few brief instructions on this subject so you would know what to look for in reference to the present tariff law passed in 1909, and you have no excuse for your ignorance——

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. For the sake of information, which I would be very glad to have, will the gentleman tell the House briefly what countries have lowered their tariff rates, and in what commodities, operating under our maximum and minimum clause?

Mr. PAYNE. I could not give the gentleman details of that in half an hour. I do not have it here, either.

We have the largest free list of any bill that was ever passed except the McKinley bill. The McKinley bill put sugar on the free list, and a little larger percentage of the importations were free under that bill than under this. But the free importations are greater than in the Dingley bill, and greater than in the Wilson bill. Almost 50 per cent of the goods coming into this country come in absolutely free, and we added to the list, and still, I suppose, some of you will go out and say we increased the duties, even in places where we took them all off. It does not seem as though there was an Ananias of that kind in the House of Representatives, but there have been so many Ananiases in the last two years that I begin to doubt any man when I look into his face as to whether he is telling the truth or not. I will put these statistics in. We increased the duties on luxuries, on whiskeys, on wines, on jewelry, on spices, and feathers that are fixed up for adornment, and toilet articles of a fancy kind, and fancy soap, and various things of that kind. We increased the duties on those in order to get more revenue. We would do it again if we were to make the bill again. I do not believe that you, with all your idea of tariff making, will take them off, either, or will reduce them a dollar's worth, or even introduce a bill to do it, or even let it get through your caucus. I think while the duties on sheep would move you, the high duties on luxuries might possibly restrain you from doing any such foolish thing as that.

As a revenue measure, it was a complete success. We were cutting down revenues in the McKinley bill, and before the period was over, after the Democratic election, we were short on our duties, and we had an actual deficit of revenue with which to meet the expenses of the Government; a thing that was continued under the Wilson bill. We passed the Dingley bill, and we had revenues under that. And we started the work of building the Panama Canal.

I did not meet a man in the House, or hear him say a word, in favor of paying the expenses of building the Panama Canal out of the current expenses of the Government and increasing the revenues in order to do it. It was the consensus of opinion that this wonderful work, the greatest undertaken by any individual nation, should be paid for by posterity, that we should issue bonds to pay for the work, and in the meantime, when we had a surplus revenue, it was a mighty good place in which to deposit it in paying for this canal as we went along. We pursued that policy, and when there was not enough accumulation of surplus—there has always been a surplus since—we issued the bonds to take the place of the money out of our current funds that had been used in building the canal.

Now, I am going to refer to this daily statement once more. June 1, right under the statements we put in, on page 2, we find "Panama Canal," and then follows "Receipts—Proceeds of bonds" and "Disbursements for canal," and "Excess of Panama Canal receipts over disbursements," with a star referring to the statement that it is a case of disbursements over receipts, because during the past year no bonds have been issued, and we have paid out for the canal during this year, up to June 1, $34,909,000, or nearly $35,000,000; to this date last fiscal year, $31,207,834.86. Now, the total amount expended on purchase and construction of the Panama Canal from its inception to this date, June 1, was $239,005,414.10; of this the Treasury has been reimbursed from the proceeds of bond sales in the sum of $87,309,594.83. The balance expended out of the general fund of the Treasury and reimbursable from the proceeds of bonds not yet sold, $151,695,819.27. The total bonds authorized by the existing law for Panama Canal—the estimated total expense—$375,000,000. The total bond issue to this date is $84,000,000. Balance of bonds authorized and not yet issued, $290,569,000. And $50,000,000 of these bonds have been advertised and the bids are to be received to-day, and they will go to reimburse the money that has been paid out of current funds and in the building of this canal. We passed two bonding acts in reference to the canal. One of them was contained in the present tariff law, and under this provision the bonds are being sold. It shows the intent of the American Congress to pay that out of the sale of bonds and charge it to the future, and let the future pay for it, and the generations to come ought to pay for it. Last year, on the 30th of June, in the Treasury reports, there was a surplus under this law that had been in force 11 months, of $15,866,328.94.

To-day we are $24,400,000 better off than we were a year ago to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.] Add that $24,400,000 to your $16,800,000 and you get $31,000,000——

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Forty-one million dollars.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; $41,000,000. I used to be a lightning calculator, but some of it has left me. It is $41,000,000. That is the amount indicated as surplus in the Treasury for this year. I put that over your false statement, which comes here with the unanimous sanction of your caucus, that the Treasury is depleted and depleting, framed in order to conjure up an excuse for putting this duty on wool. Oh, how hard pushed you were that you could not stop even to read, much less to study, the actual statements as to the condition of the United States Treasury when you were rushing this bill through the caucus and getting the assent of the weak brothers to it—men who had conscientious scruples about consenting to it!

Now, I have a statement here from the Bureau of Statistics. Here it is. It was furnished to me last fall, after the present tariff law had been in existence for a single year, commencing on the 1st day of August and running for a year. Of course five days of it ran to the Dingley law. The rest of it was under the present law. I have the amount of the imports under this law, under the McKinley law, under the Wilson law, under the Dingley law, and the revenues each year on those importations. The percentage is figured out for the entire period under each law while it was in existence. I will not stop to read all the figures. I will put them in the RECORD. They are good food for you gentlemen on that side to ponder over about the time you say your prayers and ask God to forgive you for all the lies you have told unwittingly about the present tariff law. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Here are the figures: Under the McKinley law, 44 months, percentage of duties on the dutiable goods, 47.1 per cent; the Wilson law, 35 months, similar statement, 42.8 per cent; Dingley law, 144 months, 45.8 per cent; present law, 41.3 per cent. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And remember, these figures include the high duties on the luxuries that we put into the present bill. Go out now and look some one in the face in the street and say it was not a revision downward, but a revision upward all the time! [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, we took the duties almost off of shoes and leather of every kind. We put hides on the free list. We reduced iron ore from Cuba from 40 cents a ton to 12 cents a ton, and 15 cents a ton from other countries. We had to run over my brother from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] in order to do that, but we did it, and we cut off the duty on pig iron from $4 to $2.50, and the duties on structural steel, except the finished shapes, and we put slightly higher duties on those. All through the schedules of the bill we adjusted the duties to the difference in cost of production between this country and abroad. The result was, of course, a reduction of duties. Why, we cut some duties down so low that we made the industry bleed. They are getting in more iron ore than my friend wishes we were getting, and more pig iron and more scrap iron.

Competition? Yes. They are coming here and taking part of our market. You say we promised a lowering of the tariff. It was an implied promise that where it was higher than the difference in the cost of production here and abroad we would lower it, and we promised, also, that where the duties were not protective we would still make out the difference in the cost between here and abroad. That is what we tried to do, and that is what we did with a great portion of the bill.

As I said before, we could not change this duty in the wool schedule, although some of us wanted to and believed we ought to do it. We did not do it, however, because some of the Members believed that the evidence we had before the committee would not warrant it. They had a right to their opinion and I had a right to mine. They have not changed their opinion since and I have not changed mine.

Here is the table of the Bureau of Statistics:

FIRST FULL YEAR OF NEW TARIFF LAW.

Imports of merchandise into the United States, the per cent entered free of duty, the customs receipts, and the average ad valorem rate of duty during the first 12 months' operation of the Payne tariff law (Aug. 1, 1909, to July 31, 1910), compared with the corresponding period of earlier years; also a comparison with like data covering the entire period of the Dingley, Wilson, and McKinley laws, respectively.

NOTE.—A reduction of about $55,000,000 was caused in customs receipts under the McKinley Act, due to reduced imports in the closing months under that act in anticipation of passage of Wilson tariff, whose revenues were correspondingly increased. Likewise, a reduction of about $45,000,000 was caused in customs receipts under the Dingley Act, due to heavy imports in closing months of the Wilson law, whose revenues were correspondingly increased. The high percentage of free imports under the McKinley law is largely due to the fact that sugar was on the free list under that act. Of merchandise other than sugar imported under that law, 39.56 per cent was free of duty.

Mr. FORDNEY. A few minutes ago the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], on the question of files, said that this man, Samuel L. Nicholson, who was making files, stated that they were selling them abroad at a profit. I want to show you by the record that he stated they were selling at a loss. I refer the gentleman to page 2201 of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee in the preparation of the Payne tariff bill. You will find that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in questioning Mr. Nicholson, said:

I want to know whether the amount or price at which you were selling your files on the average in these markets is less than the cost of production, with freight added.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I should say that the actual transaction in those two countries—Germany and France—was showing no profit.

That was the thing I had in mind.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit me to read a statement in reply to that, to get it into the RECORD?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; please give the page.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Page 2201:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In Australia you are not selling at a loss?
Mr. NICHOLSON. No.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. You are selling files in France?
Mr. NICHOLSON. Yes; to a limited extent.

And then he goes on and asks a number of other questions, and the concluding one is:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does not show you a loss, does it?
Mr. NICHOLSON. We do not figure it as a loss, because there are different ways of fixing what your cost is.

And the testimony shows that he was chased through 20 or 30 printed pages of testimony, and that he qualified, ducked, evaded, and dodged, although it is quite apparent to everybody who read the testimony that he was conducting his operations at a profit in those foreign countries, because he complained at one time——

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman make his speech short?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I will conclude in a second or two. He complained at one time that in one country he was going to do less business than he had the year before on account of the raising of the tariff.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you will read the whole paragraph you will see he states that because the tariff was imposed upon those goods they were doing business without profit, but in the countries where there was no tariff they may have made some profit, if they figured their cost in a certain way. That is what the gentleman has read.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. If the gentleman will buy me a box of cigarettes, I will buy him a cigar.

Mr. FORDNEY. If I owed you one, I would buy it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I think the committee understands it now. Of course, Mr. Chairman, figuring the percentage on the dutiable goods, you give us no credit for the duties that are remitted entirely. For instance, hides disappear from the dutiable list and go on the free list, and of course they show no reduction in the general percentage. So with the other matters placed upon the free list. For the entire period of the McKinley law the percentage of duty on the whole list, dutiable and free, was 22.1 per cent, and that with free sugar. Under the Wilson law the percentage was 21.9, under the Dingley law 25.5, and under the present law 21 per cent, or lower than any of them. [Applause on the Republican side.] We were revising the Dingley bill, and we reduced these duties from 25.5 to 21 per cent exactly.

But, gentlemen, what was the percentage of reduction of the duty itself? Of course you must subtract the percentage of the duty under the present law from that under the Dingley law and divide that difference by the Dingley ad valorem to get at that fact. When you do that you will find that the reduction in the duties on the dutiable list in the present law is a reduction of 10 per cent from the duties in the Dingley law, on the dutiable list, and the reduction of the duties on the whole business, the equivalent ad valorem under the present law, is a reduction of 0.176 per cent as compared with the duties on the whole business in the Dingley law. Was that a revision upward? Now, honestly, gentlemen, was that a revision upward? These are the Treasury figures of the entire receipts on the goods imported. What is the use? Let justice be done, though your imaginary Democratic heavens fall. Come out and confess the truth, just as you are willing to about the revenue, now that you have been so thoroughly exposed.

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does the gentleman admit that heaven is Democratic?

Mr. PAYNE. I yield first to the gentleman from Ohio. I did not catch the remark of the gentleman from New Jersey, and I do not want it to go into the RECORD unless I understand what it is.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to a statement made by me in the debate last year in reply to a statement that the Payne law had increased the duties on the necessities of life. I challenged any gentleman, as I do now, on that side of the aisle to mention one article of daily necessity used either in the poor man's home or on his table, or upon his person, the duty on which had been increased, and the only answer I received was "lemons."

Mr. HARRISON of New York. All sorts of cotton manufactures. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman can not name one.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, if I had the time and the strength I would pursue this thing. There is not a phase of it that I am not willing to meet anywhere with any man that lives. [Applause on the Republican side.] All I want is the truth. I do not care to gain my cause by lying, and never did. I have generally weighed my statements before I made them, and sought to verify them. If I have made mistakes, they have been unintentional mistakes. [Applause on the Republican side.] Some of you people have made honest mistakes. Do not repeat them. Find out about it; and if you find you are wrong, say so. It will not make much difference. The period of vilification in the public press has passed. They begin to speak well of this bill. I have had people writing for the muck-rake magazines introduce themselves to me, take me by the hand, and say, "I was prejudiced against your bill and your action in the committee. I did not think you went in for an honest revision of the tariff. I did not think you reduced the duties in the tariff; but since then I have read every word of the evidence, every word of your examination of the witnesses, and I have compared the bill with what went before, and I want to apologize to you now and say that I have been utterly mistaken in regard to this bill and the way it was made and in the framing of it."

Of course, gentlemen, like all others, I like to have a good reputation. I do not like to be hounded and followed with slanderous vituperation. I have had a good deal of it in my day, and I have got to be pretty thickskinned.

I had the Porto Rico business for several months after the bill became a law, and on an appeal the Supreme Court decided our powers in regard to the taxation of imports from Porto Rico, and after the constitutionality of that law was affirmed by the Supreme Court a certain Senator in the Senate had put on the civil government bill, that had been reported by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. COOPER, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House, and it was announced in the papers and in the bill and was referred to in the Supreme Court decision as the law of that Senator.

I never got any credit for it. I do not care anything about that. I do not care anything for abuse or for the vilification. In the law itself I put a provision that the money raised for this should go for the support of schools and the building of schoolhouses and civil government in that island. I found that they needed the revenue. A newspaper editor came from the West and said he never got any idea that that was in the bill. Constituents wanted to know why I did not put it in. But that does not make much difference. That is past history. But here is a great piece of legislation involving the welfare and the comfort of millions, and no partisan exigency, no spleen manifested outside of this Hall ought to keep them from telling the truth about the present tariff law. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished honor of following the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in these concluding hours of the debate I fully appreciate. I assure the House that their patience will not be wearied nor their time be taxed by unnecessary details.

The distinguished gentleman from New York, the former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and the author of the present tariff law, has taken a very wide range in the discussion of this bill. He has talked about almost everything except the bill. His attack upon the Democracy, Democratic doctrines and policies, and statements of Democrats in recent years, seems to be mixed with a considerable amount of feeling. That feeling appears to be largely personal, a thing I regret, because questions of this kind are not generally seen very clearly by those who have personal feeling to blear their vision and to influence the method of mental procedure in considering the various questions at issue. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is rather harsh—perhaps not intentionally, but in the force of his feeling—in characterizing the various Democratic statements that have been made in reference to the Payne bill, a measure which he, as its author, vigorously defends. I think his reference to the Ananias Club is hardly appropriate. The Ananias Club, as I understand it, is an organization purely Republican in its origin. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The gentleman says that the present bill is simply a tissue of falsehoods, and he characterizes it as "lies" and objects to our going to the country with "lies," and he says that if we go to the country in that way we will be repudiated. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I agree with him that the country will not commend us for falsehoods and lying, or for any kind of deception. So far as the danger of being repudiated by the people on account of lying is concerned, I am quite sure that the information is very reliable, coming as it does from a stand-pat Republican. Experience is a great teacher, and the Republican machine has had much experience in deception and in receiving the punishment therefor.

But, Mr. Chairman, this bill is not a lying bill, it is not a deceptive measure. Whether it is wise or foolish, whether it should meet with the approval of the American people or not, whether it should become a law upon the statute books or should fail to pass, are matters that can be discussed fully, fairly, and clearly. There is no necessity nor cause for snarling anger. The bill is clear in its terms, and there has been ample time for its consideration and discussion. Many speeches have been made during this discussion relevant and irrelevant to the bill. Many of them, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, will stand as beacon lights to guide future legislators in considering and revising this schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Many of them, not so relevant to the bill, are nevertheless full of information and wisdom, and they will be read by coming generations, and studied by men who desire honestly to serve the public. Right here I wish to say that the weakness of the Republican position in reference to this bill is very apparent. They show the paucity of their store of arguments when their principal speakers spend most of their time in discussing what they claim was a great mistake made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in reference to the daily financial report of the Treasury. The gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, stated in his opening speech that the Treasury was in "a depleted and depleting condition." The same statement is made in the report of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting this bill; and like allegation was made by resolution of the Democratic caucus. This statement is denied by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], Republican leader on that side, and the denial reiterated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

If the gentleman from Alabama made a mistake in reference to one item in a long and intricate financial daily Treasury statement what does it signify? The gist of it is this, that the Treasury under a Republican administration is, and has been for a long time, depleted and in a depleting condition. They may make all the denials they think proper; the facts remain. The money has already been appropriated out of the Treasury by statute for 1911 and 1912. The incidental revenue has been phenomenally large in the last few months (a condition that can not be counted on to remain). Gentlemen may take advantage of the fact that, on account of a number of unusual circumstances, the general fund in the Treasury has not been depleted and is not depleting so much as it has been, but the fact stands that the expenses of this Government are more than the revenue that can reasonably be expected from the laws as they stand to-day; and I reassert in my place here in this House that the records will bear it out, and I reaffirm the fact, as stated by the gentleman from Alabama, and as stated by the caucus, and as stated in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the Treasury of the United States is in "a depleted and depleting condition." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That being the case, the Democracy of this House, in framing tariff legislation, should endeavor, of course, to provide for the expenses that have been contracted for the coming year. The Canadian reciprocity bill, a Republican measure, already passed by this House, will cause a loss to the Treasury of some ten or twelve million dollars a year, according to some estimates. It will probably pass the Senate and become a law. The Republican leaders in the House earnestly, apparently (because I will not question their sincerity and call their position "lies"), declared most vehemently that this administration bill was a blow at protectionism, and that it would deplete the Treasury.

The ludicrous part of their contention, however, was the plea that the bill would injure the farmer. These champions of the protected interests were awfully afraid the farmer would suffer. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], in the conclusion of his speech against Canadian reciprocity on February 14, 1911, said:

Mr. Chairman, I have shown that this measure is an unwise business measure. I have shown you years of disaster under a Canadian reciprocity agreement, and after its denunciation succeeding years of great prosperity down to this blessed day. I have shown you that this measure is unrepublican; that it violates the principles of the Republican Party; that it abandons protection and espouses free trade. It is a violation of the pledge of every Republican platform for the last 50 years of our history. [Applause.] I have shown you that this measure is obnoxious class legislation, that it sacrifices the farmer, the bone and sinew of the Republic, and destroys his interests. And now I fain would appeal to party loyalty, but I know it is of no use. The Republican protectionist, when this vote is taken, marches to his doom. He can not resist a united Democratic Party and such Republicans as hear from somewhere else an appeal louder than the appeal of party loyalty. United, together they will march to victory under Democratic leadership under the folds of the Democratic free-trade flag. I decline to follow. I shall stand where I have always stood, and go down with my party.

He followed this speech with a motion—to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instruction to report the same back with the addition of the following articles to the reciprocal free list, to wit:

"Fresh meat and all meat products, flour, prepared cereal foods, bran, agricultural implements, cotton ties and bagging, binding twine, and lumber."

In his desire to be just to the farmer, in his desire that the bill should be fair, he offered this motion. Now, he knew that would endanger the passage of the bill.

The Democrats did not take the bait, but passed the bill, in good faith, through this House, passed it up to a Republican Senate, passed it as an administration measure, a step in the right direction, of a Republican complexion, which at the same time did promise some relief. Mr. Taft had gotten up that measure in answer to a nation-wide clamor for relief from the Payne-Aldrich bill. Mr. Taft had gotten it up to meet that popular clamor, and yet——

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. FOCHT. I would regret very much to have the remarks of the gentleman pass into the RECORD without some protest with respect, at least, to the statement that this is a Republican measure. It may be an administration measure, but, as the gentleman well knows, a majority of the Republican Members voted against it, and I say to-day that it does not reflect the Republican sentiment of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Well, I thought it was a Republican measure. The gentleman admits it is an administration measure and I understood it was a Republican administration, at least in name. If it is an administration measure of a Republican administration, it is a Republican measure; and the fact that many of those who are known as the stand-pat Republicans, who run the Republican machine in this House, opposed the bill simply means that reciprocity was a step in the interest of the people, as against the special interests which the stand-pat Republicans here in this House constantly defend, and that is the reason they fought it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will yield for a question, but I do not want the gentleman to make a speech in my time, as I am going to get through very soon.

Mr. FOCHT. Is it not a fact that the so-called insurgent element—the progressive element—stood solidly against reciprocity, or so-called reciprocity, and stand solidly against it in the Senate, and that the construction you would put upon this phase of the situation is not the correct one—that it was supported solely by the stand-pat Republicans?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Why, Mr. Chairman, I understand there is some division of opinion in reference to this matter. I understand the insurgents, so called, had been stirred up because it was claimed that the farmers in the West would not favor the bill unless they were protected; and yet, when the farmers' free-list bill was presented by a Democratic caucus, and by the Democrats of this House was passed, many of those gentlemen on the Republican side who had made such strenuous talk for the farmer talked against the bill which placed on the free list what the farmer has to buy. They said it would do the farmer no good; it was not just to anybody; it would deplete the revenues, and so forth; and yet we noticed that when it came to a vote on that bill the line of demarcation between the stand-pat Republicans and the brethren known as insurgents was much more marked.

The insurgents looked more with favor upon the bill. The reciprocity bill was forced on the administration by popular clamor for tariff reform. It was the best that could be done under the circumstances, the President thought, and was intended to allay popular clamor and thus avoid a general revision of the tariff. The champions of protectionism felt that the protection wall was in danger of serious injury and, perhaps, total destruction by concessions contained in the reciprocity bill. They were fighting for protection, and not because the bill lacked merit.

Those who have devoted their lives to the service of the protected interests and know the sources of their predatory power oppose to a man any breach in the protection wall. The specially favored interests know that the beneficiaries of the system must stand together, or the graft of each will be lost by the downfall of the whole system. No revision of the tariff can be made by men of that mind. Hence, their desperate effort to arouse the distrust of the farmer and appeal to his selfishness and cupidity. If the agricultural interests can be combined with "predatory wealth," protectionism may get a new lease on life; otherwise the people will triumph and the fruits of labor will enrich the toiler. That fight was made in the name of labor, and in the name of the farmer, when, as a matter of fact, it was for the manufacturers and trust magnates, and them only.

It is claimed that this revision of the woolen schedule is not a Democratic bill. Some gentlemen of high standing on the other side of the aisle differ very much in their characterization of this measure. We are told by one, the floor leader on that side, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the protection in this bill is so high it is absolutely unconscionable as a revenue measure. And another gentleman, a former leader on the floor and former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who has just addressed the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], takes the position that the protection is so low that it will destroy the manufacturer in the woolen industry in this country if it should become a law. He sounds that alarm, hoping that the bill will not pass, and that his prophecy may stand as a terrorizing agent to those who are interested in the woolen industry. Why do those men of such high standing on that side of the House speak such opposite doctrine? Why is it that some of the best minds on that side, instead of saying that this bill is undemocratic, instead of saying that it is entirely lacking in any protective feature, instead of saying it is so high protection that it is unconscionable, admit that it is a great improvement on the present law, and they will have to vote for it on that account? If it is an improvement on the present law, then, why should we fight it and talk about deceiving people, talk about trying to deceive the public, and lying to the public? If the bill is an improvement it ought to be voted for by Democrats, Republicans, or any other Members of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not know that I am so specially concerned about whether this bill is a strictly Democratic measure or not. We have to do the best we can according to circumstances. The Democratic Party declared in favor of a gradual reduction of the tariff. What did it mean by that? Everybody understood it. A system had been built up under the high protection of the Republican tariff; conditions had arisen that we must deal with intelligently in the interest of the whole people; and it was not deemed best in revising the tariff to a revenue basis that we should do so in such a sudden manner as to cause any undue shock to the people or the business interests of the country, but that, with strong hands and clear minds, diligently considering the task, we endeavor to readjust the tariff so that the stilts should not break and inflated business suddenly topple and fall, but unnatural conditions should be corrected in a sensible, gradual way to a proper economic basis.

As to Schedule K, have not we reduced it, and considerably reduced it? And yet, I ask every candid man, no matter on which side of the House he may be, is it not a fact that an average of 40 per cent on woolen cloth is a tariff that the manufacturer has no right to complain about, even from the protection standpoint?

I am not here to say there is no protection in the bill. I could not candidly state that. The inequalities and defects have not all be removed. But from the standpoint of a tariff for revenue I would say that the bill is well framed for that result and at the same time with the view to a gradual reduction of the tariff to a proper revenue basis. If we desired to put the bill down to a Democratic basis at once, there would be somewhat of a shock, perhaps, to the woolen manufacturing industry. We, however, could have put raw wool on the free list and followed the Democratic doctrine for the last 50 years or longer, without any shock to the woolen industry, and have reduced the amount of the tariff on the finished product. By so doing under present conditions the amount of the revenue would be greatly decreased. The woolen industry, by having free wool, could afford to have the tariff reduced at least 10 per cent. In other words, if we put 25 per cent ad valorem on woolen cloth with free raw wool, the manufacturer would be in the same condition, practically, as with raw wool at 20 per cent and woolen cloth at 40 per cent, as in this bill. But anyone who is familiar with the statistics in reference to it will see, and will be bound to admit, that the amount of revenue would be greatly decreased. It is estimated that there will be about $13,000,000 derived from raw wool under this bill. That is less than raw wool brings in under the present law, but this tax is only 20 per cent ad valorem, while the present law of 11 cents a pound is from 40 to 60 per cent ad valorem. The manufacturer has claimed, and receives under the Payne bill, a "compensatory" duty of 44 cents a pound on account of the tariff on raw wool. Now, to remove the tariff from raw wool and to remove the compensatory duty would leave him where he would have all the protection that he claimed his industry was entitled to when the Payne-Aldrich law was written, to wit, from 50 to 55 per cent ad valorem.

We propose to strike out the specific duty of 44 cents per pound and to reduce the ad valorem duty 20 per cent. Gentlemen on that side find it bewildering their wits to decide whether to condemn the bill for the protection retained by it or to rave their bitter denunciation for its reduction of protection. The consumer evidently has reason to hope. This bill is denounced as being one of ad valorem duties. That fact is one of its chief virtues. The Payne-Aldrich bill in this very same wool schedule puts on ad valorem duties, specific duties, compensatory duties, every kind of combination duties you can name and mixes them up, so that no one can tell just what the tariffs paid by the people really are. Only experts can even estimate the amounts. It is a cunning device, combining the different kinds of duties, accentuating the evils of each, deceiving the people, robbing the consumer, cutting off revenue, and fostering monopoly.

We have only the one simple method—the ad valorem duties. Our plan is better for the woolgrower as well as the consumer. It works no injustice on anyone. It is easily understood and applied. As shown last night by the able argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], the sheep raiser can get more under a 20 per cent ad valorem duty than he had ever gotten under the specific duty of 11 cents a pound.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand that the gentleman says that a decrease of the duty by 60 per cent will increase the price of raw wool?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I think that while that may be a seeming paradox, it yet may really be the fact, and if the gentleman was not here last night and did not hear the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota, I would recommend that he get his speech when it appears in the RECORD and read it carefully and he will find it was very fully demonstrated.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I will ask the gentleman if the duty on raw wool was reduced 60 per cent for the purpose of increasing its price?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It was reduced for the purpose of raising revenue in the amount named.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman says that the duty was formerly somewhere between 40 and 60 per cent, and that it is now reduced to 20 per cent.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That is the average.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; the average. Now, I will ask the gentleman this: Whether he thinks by reducing the duty from 60 per cent to 20 per cent that will increase the price of raw wool?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I say that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], in a very carefully prepared and learned dissertation on this subject, showed it quite conclusively, and I think he would have convinced the gentleman from Ohio, if he had heard him, that under this law the wool producer, if he sees proper, can recover more profit under a 20 per cent ad valorem tariff than he has ever been able to get under a tariff of 11 cents a pound.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In other words, it will increase the price of raw wool? Will it? I would like to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. He will get more for it. The wool producer will get more out of this bill than out of the Payne-Aldrich bill, but at the same time the price of the finished product to the people will be only 10 per cent higher, by reason of the tax on raw wool, whereas under the Payne-Aldrich bill it was 44 per cent higher.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, let me ask the gentleman this question: He states that if raw wool had been put on the free list you could have reduced the duty carried in this bill to the manufacturer. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that if wool is placed on the free list it would have very much reduced the price?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Well, of course, all the wool that is imported into the country has to be paid for according to the rate fixed in the law, and all the imported wool would be taxed 20 per cent ad valorem under this bill. It is taxed now at 11 cents a pound.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I asked the gentleman a question that he can answer by "Yes" or "No." I asked him whether, in the event raw wool was placed on the free list, it would reduce its price?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It might do it temporarily, but I really believe the general result of it would be an increased price, by reason of the industry being on a better basis. In other words, I believe that all the tax on raw wool, so far as the protection standpoint is concerned, is a pure gratuity to the wool producer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is it! And therefore he gets the higher price, does he not?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. All he gets is a pure gratuity.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why is it a gratuity?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I say all that he gets is a gratuity.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to know if the gentleman desires to go into the RECORD, as the ranking member of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. What I say will go into the RECORD, and I will stand by that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to know if the gentleman wants to go into the RECORD as saying that a reduction of the duty on raw wool will increase the price of raw wool?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I believe eventually it will, but temporarily it will not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wanted to know.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That is my candid answer.

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman will yield to me, I am interested also from the wool producer's standpoint. Do I understand the gentleman correctly that he indorses the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], which shows that the wool producer will have a more effective revenue protection—if I may use that term—under the new bill than he had under the old one?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I have just expressed myself along that line. I think he will be benefited by it.

Mr. SLOAN. Then, as a matter of fact, this bill raises the protection over what it has been heretofore to the wool producer?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not understand that every revenue item is protection, and I do not care to be led off into that sort of a discussion. Some gentlemen believe there is "protection" wherever you levy any tariff. I am not going into such abstruse questions as that. As a matter of fact, whatever protection this bill has in it is simply a necessary remnant of the protection in the present tariff law.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is it not true that this bill, by wiping out the discrimination that now exists between the duties on first and second class wool, will to that extent redound to the benefit of the home wool producer?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Very much so. We do not produce the finest wool. Under the ad valorem duty the wool in this country will have a much better showing in the market than it would on the basis of so much a pound of specific duty. That has been argued, and I think it is correct; but I do not propose to take up the time to go through the same argument again, or to elaborate on that question.

This discussion is getting clear away from the range of my intended remarks. I do not desire to take all my time on these lines.

Mr. SLOAN. Has any wool producer in the United States asked for a change in the tariff on raw wool from what it is now to the basis in the proposed bill?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I understand a number of wool producers in the Middle West have written letters to their Members of Congress here, stating that they wanted free wool, but, to be candid with the gentleman, I do not know of any large producers who have asked it. I did not expect that they would. The miserable arrangement that was made by the Republican Party, of which it ought to be ashamed, the nefarious combination that was made between the woolgrower and the wool manufacturer, in connection with the Republican machine, to rob the public, has so blinded the sheepmen and enriched the manufacturers they still clamor for the schedule to stand untouched. They say leave Schedule K alone. There is no reason on earth why a man who owns a sheep should tax the balance of the people, and the poor people at that, in order to make his wool sell for a little more; he has no right to do it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman, as I understand, is arguing in favor of increasing that price?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Oh, the gentleman from Ohio does not understand my argument.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman said that this was an iniquitous duty to enable the sheep owner to tax the public, and now he comes in and says that this bill will increase the price of raw wool.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio seems to have his mind at a different angle from mine. I say that the arrangement existed, and exists, and I also add that the wool producer, while he may imagine he is getting something—and some of them seem to think they are benefited by it—as a matter of fact he is robbed by the woolen manufacturer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman just said he was robbing the public.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. They together are robbing the public, and the manufacturer is putting the money in his pocket.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think the present price of raw wool too high?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not know whether it is too high or too low; that question has nothing to do with the argument I am making.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has everything to do with the argument the gentleman is making, unless the gentleman is frank enough to say that the purpose of the bill is to increase the price of wool.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The purpose of the bill is to raise revenue for the Treasury of the United States. I believe the effect of the bill will be good for the men that raise sheep. I have said that several times, and I think the gentleman from Ohio ought to understand it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to know what the gentleman's views are on the tariff—as to the effect of the tariff on the price. Now, I will take a parallel case. The present duty on iron ore——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would rather the gentleman would put his inquiry without putting a parallel case.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to know whether the gentleman considers the duty on iron ore affects the price to the consumer?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It may or it may not. I would rather talk about wool. I do not desire to go into the iron schedule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman does not care to be interrupted——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Oh, the gentleman may ask me any question about the wool matter. The gentleman's question is, Will the price of wool be raised—that is, will the tariff affect the price of wool? I suppose it does affect the price some; but, in my opinion, under the best light that I can get from those who know the most about it, the woolgrower gets about 2 cents a pound more than he would get if there were no tariff on it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman just said that the effect of this bill, which decreases the duty 60 per cent, will increase the price over the iniquitous price they are now getting.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I believe eventually the wool producer will profit by free wool. His idea to-day is that he can not raise sheep unless protected by law. Men do not desire to go into a business of that kind ordinarily; they do not know when the law might be changed and the business would fail. The president pro tempore of the Senate of Texas, who claims to be a Democrat, and who is candid enough to admit that he is a protectionist, is a woolgrower, and one of the largest in the State, and has been in the business over 20 years, attending to it himself. While here, during this session, he said that wool could be raised as cheaply in Texas, or cheaper, than anywhere else in the world if it was not for the scab and the wolves.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now, let me ask the gentleman this question, in order to bring out clearly what his views are. I will ask the gentleman if the object of himself and his colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee in bringing in this bill reducing the duty on wool is for the purpose of increasing the price of wool?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. No; it is not for that purpose. It is for revenue.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am speaking of the reduction.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have answered the question several times. How many times does the gentleman want it answered? I have answered the question several times, that that was not our purpose. Is that an answer or not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; it is not.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Then does the gentleman want me to say that such is our purpose? I will not make that answer.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas allow the gentleman from Ohio to ask the question and answer it also.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether he thinks this bill will increase the price of raw wool?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I want to treat my colleague fairly, but——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, if the gentleman does not desire to be interrupted I shall not do it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I want to treat the gentleman with every courtesy, but I submit he is asking a question of whether this tariff was fixed on wool for the purpose of raising the price. I say "no." I think that is an answer to the question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The reduction of the duty has reduced the revenue, has it not?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It will reduce it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has, according to the gentleman's statement, reduced it about ten million.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. No; about eight; it would do it if this bill becomes a law—that is, reduce the revenue on raw wool.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman why, if this bill is in the interest of the consumer, you reduce the revenue, unless it is to depreciate the price of wool?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Wool being free, American wool would not sell for as much in the home market, perhaps, under normal conditions, as it would under tariff duty. The situation, however, is such, and the conditions have been and are such, that the producer does not get more than about 2 cents a pound on his raw wool by reason of the tariff and it does not pay nearly so much as the gentleman thinks it does.

The statement of this gentleman from Texas who, I believe, is the president of the Woolgrowers' Association in that State, is that they could raise wool in Texas at as small a cost as anywhere else in the world, except for the wolves and the scab. He further informed us that the State of Texas had already appropriated money to kill out the wolves, which will be exterminated in a very few years; not to exceed five years. He also said that the scab could be eradicated by dipping; that the trouble had been that men would neglect to dip; that he had succeeded in getting a law passed that required dipping for scab, and if the sheep owner did not do it, it would be done at his expense by the State. Not only that, but, he said, by dipping the sheep, and by having wire fences to protect them from the wolves, the wool could be produced as cheaply there now as anywhere else in the world, and he said he was for protection for the next five years. That was his statement.

The committee decided that for revenue it was necessary to put 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool. Other bills that we had passed would reduce the tariff receipts. The Treasury had been depleted, and was being depleted, under Republican extravagance. This bill was framed, and when we are taunted with having rejected the old Democratic policy of free raw wool it seems to me that the gentlemen who inveigh against misrepresentation should stop and consider. Take this bill and the resolution passed by the caucus together. What do they mean? They mean that the Democratic Party, which has stood for free raw wool for more than 50 years and never did as a policy stand for a tax on raw wool, presented this bill as an emergency measure, for the purpose of revenue and not as a rejection of Democratic principles nor a change of the established policy of the party.

In order that the country might fully understand the position of the party as to taxing raw wool, the Democratic caucus of this House, on June 1, at the time this bill was approved, passed, by a practically unanimous vote, this resolution:

Resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy; but in view of the Democratic platform demand for a gradual reduction of the tariff and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury—a result of Republican extravagance—a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

Now, my friends, is it a Democratic doctrine? The wiles of the sophist and the craftiness of deceit could not obscure the clearness of that declaration.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. It was in keeping with that plank of the national platform of 1908 which provided that in the reduction of the tariff it should be made gradually until it reached a revenue basis solely.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly; the resolution stated that. Every Democratic platform since 1856 declared for free wool. In my individual opinion, a gradual reduction on raw wool is not necessary. Were it not for revenue necessities, wool could and would go upon the free list. The tax on manufactures, however, should be gradually reduced. Woolen mills have been builded on an artificial basis by reason of tariff protection; woolgrowing has not. Free wool would permit a greater reduction and a quicker riddance from discriminating rates on woolen manufactures. It would be cheaper to the consumer and better for the business.

Mr. GARNER. Will my colleague yield for a question right there?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Why would not my colleague be willing to allow the same duty on raw wool that he does on the finished article—the same rate of duty?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I might and I might not. It depends on circumstances. I am not one of those who believe that raw material must be taxed because the finished product is taxed, nor am I one who subscribes to the doctrine that as a matter of principle we should have free raw material——

Mr. GARNER. What is the objection, then, to levying the same rate——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will state my position.

Mr. GARNER. To levying the same rate on the raw material that you levy on the manufactured article?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That depends upon the situation entirely.

Mr. GARNER. Let us take it in reference to wool. What is the objection to levying the same rate on raw wool that you levy on the manufactured article?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. One reason is that in the wisdom of the caucus they did not decide to do it.

I think free wool would have been better, but the wisdom of the caucus, the wisdom of the party, dictated that, instead, there should be levied a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem. While I admit it is reasonable, from the standpoint of getting revenue, to put it at 20 per cent, and cloth at 40 per cent, yet I do not believe it was a necessity. The caucus thought so; I agreed to it.

Mr. GARNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, just one other question. Would my colleague be willing, then, to levy a 25 per cent duty on raw wool and 25 per cent duty on the manufactured article, which would raise the same amount of duty raised under the present rate in this bill?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would rather reduce the tariff on the manufactured article, giving free raw wool, because I know that when we place the lowest revenue rate on the finished article it will cost the consumer much less than a tax on both, and so I prefer to put the tax in this schedule on the manufactured product.

Mr. GARNER. Twenty-five per cent ad valorem would be the height that the manufacturer of this country could sell his article under a revenue duty. If we levy 25 per cent on the raw material and 25 per cent on the manufactured article would it cost the consumer one dime more?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It would not cost the consumer any more if the price of the manufactured article remained the same, but it would cost the consumer less if, instead of taxing raw wool, you lowered the tariff on manufactures to 20 per cent. If the manufacturer can stand 25 per cent tax on raw wool, we can, with free wool, greatly reduce both the tariff rate and the cost to the consumer. Thus imports would increase, holding prices to a reasonable figure, bringing in revenue, and opening the markets of the world to our people. If you put the tax on raw wool at 20 per cent, or any other rate, you would necessarily have to raise the tax on manufactures. I do not desire to go into that further.

Mr. GARNER. I want to understand it. The gentleman says it is necessary. Why is it necessary?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Everyone admits that, and if you calculate you will find it necessary. I believe that taxed raw wool is bad for the manufacturer—I mean the legitimate manufacturer who is not trying to rob anybody—and it is bad for the woolgrower. I believe with free raw wool and a low revenue tariff on woolen goods if our manufacturers, instead of giving us shoddy goods, instead of giving us poor quality, instead of manufacturing under high protection and combining for the purpose of exploiting the American market, would endeavor to compete in the great markets of the world as well as at home, they would be the greatest woolen manufacturers in all the world.

Under natural conditions every farm would have some sheep for mutton and for wool and as scavengers. It is estimated a sheep is worth about $2 per annum for increasing the fertility of the farm. All of these items would count, and if our woolen manufacturers would take the proper position in the markets of the world it would be better for this country and better for the wool producers, although I do not believe sheep would be produced for wool alone.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact, now, if our American manufacturer for foreign consumption is permitted to use foreign raw material free of duty?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Nearly so.

Mr. GARNER. Ninety-nine per cent.

Mr. SIMS. Now, why is it that we think so much more of the foreigner than we do of our home people, and why do we not give the American manufacturer free raw material when he manufactures for home demands?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I think that is simply a situation which——

Mr. SIMS. Therefore the manufacturer does not pay the tax on goods now manufactured for foreigners?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. He pays the tariff, manufactures the wool for exportation, and then collects back 99 per cent of the tax. This is called his drawback. Of course, he would be out some time and trouble and interest, and so forth. That would amount to very little; but even that little considerably impedes him in getting into the foreign markets. The condition is this: The manufacturer is willing to combine with the wool producer—who ought to be ashamed of himself to be in such unholy combination—and the American consumer is compelled to pay exorbitant prices or do without woolen goods. Our manufacturers export very little and buy American-grown wool at their own price. We consume in round numbers about $420,000,000 worth of woolen goods in this country, $20,000,000 of which are imported. Five per cent are imported; and the woolen manufacturer is content to rob the people of his own country rather than compete here and in the markets of the world for his fair, just, and honest position among business men.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I was going to say, apropos of the question asked by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], that I presume the gentleman from Texas knew that we did not export more than one-half of 1 per cent of the output of woolen and worsted manufactures in this country. It is so little it is absolutely negligible, and so I do not see any point in discussing that question.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I thank the gentleman for his statement. I thought I had practically said that. They do not try to get into the markets of the world. They are content to stay here in this country and rob these people. Take a suit of clothes that is worth $8, say, in England, and we put a tariff of 50 per cent ad valorem on it.

The home man does not charge the $12 if the English merchant or manufacturer proposes to contest the market, but he can sell that at $10 and run the English manufacturer out, because the English manufacturer must pay the 50 per cent. He can sell at $8 in an open market. He must pay $4 to come into the market, making the suits cost $12. Hence he must sell the suit at $12, and then he is cutting just as close in competition as he was before in selling it at $8. He is soon run out of the market, and then the American manufacturer will charge the $12, and perhaps $13, or $14, or $15 in some places, but ordinarily, perhaps, he would not go over the amount of the tariff.

Mr. AMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Let me finish this illustration, and then I will. But he charges the $12. Now, suppose he had half the market before there was any tariff. If the English merchant kept the same trade he would pay $4 on the same suit, and that would go into the Treasury; so that if he maintained his trade, the American people would get into the Treasury 50 per cent ad valorem on half of the such woolen suits—those imported—and would be paying 50 per cent ad valorem also on those manufactured here, which would go into the pockets of the American manufacturers. But it does not work that way.

The foreigner is driven out of the market, and we pay $12 for the suit of clothes. But that is not all. Not a dollar of it goes into the Treasury. But that is not the worst of it. Having no competition from abroad, they simply combine. You say, "Oh, maybe they may not." But they have combined; and there has been no power yet found that can keep them from it. Certainly no Republican administration has ever kept them from it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, then, what is the result? They decrease the quality of the goods, and soon instead of two suits at $8 apiece, costing $16, the same man would have to buy three suits at $12 apiece, which would cost him $36. And yet the two good suits would last as long as the three inferior ones, and would look very much better; because a good suit looks very well as long as it lasts, whereas a poor suit does not even look well when it is new.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to give an illustration showing that where the tariff was 50 per cent it would keep out the Englishman from our market on clothing. Now, what is the rate of tariff in this bill on clothing?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Forty-five per cent.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman draw a very broad distinction between the 50 per cent of his illustration and the 45 per cent under this bill?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I did not say the Payne-Aldrich bill had a duty of 50 per cent. I only gave that figure for easy calculation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's illustration was based on a tariff of 50 per cent?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That was as an illustration.

Mr. MANN. Yes. I say the gentleman's illustration was based on 50 per cent?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, by illustration, attempted to demonstrate—very likely correctly—that that would keep out the foreigner from our market.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I think it would, very largely.

Mr. MANN. Would the 45 per cent?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. With taxed wool it will be very much less objectionable. It will not keep it out nearly as much as the 93 per cent under the Payne-Aldrich bill. The gentleman must remember, Mr. Chairman, there are a great many things in this schedule—wool and cloth and suits of clothes, and various articles—that are manufactured abroad that have practically no competition here, because the manufacturers here do not produce a similar article, and, therefore, we get some importations into the country.

That is the way we get about 5 per cent of the woolen goods that are consumed here. But if the manufacturers of this country produced every class and kind of goods that the foreigner tries to bring in they could keep him out entirely. They do not try to keep him out on everything. They let him make some fancy or special goods and bring them in, thereby raising some revenue. The duty is so high that an importation of $20,000,000 worth of those goods brings in about $20,000,000 of revenue; or, to be more accurate, $23,000,000 of imports brought in last year $20,000,000 of revenue. The foreigner can not compete. Imported goods are of kinds not manufactured here, or such as the taste of the buyer prefers to the home manufacture. It is only in that way that we get any revenue out of it at all, and if, as I said, there were no woolen products imported except those that the American manufacturer commonly produces, he could, if he desired, keep every dollar's worth from coming into this country.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I understood the gentleman to say that when these manufacturers get together, in some mysterious way they depreciate the value of their product.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I did not say that. I said that, competition being cut off, they have the market and fix the price on the consumer; that they can levy on him all that the consumer will pay for the goods, and when they have no competition they can reduce the quality.

Mr. WEEKS. Has that been the case?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I think there has been a great deal of complaint about it.

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the gentleman know that we use nearly 50 per cent more wool per capita in our clothing than any nation in the world?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I am not aware of that fact.

Mr. WEEKS. That is a fact; and the amount of cotton used in our clothing has diminished 50 per cent in the last 10 years.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If the gentleman will hear me, I did not say that we do not have woolen manufactures that are fit to wear, but I do say that the quality in our woolen manufactures is not what it would be if there was competition which made it necessary.

Mr. WEEKS. You will admit that there is free competition in Great Britain.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes; and they make better goods there than our manufacturers make, too.

Mr. WEEKS. But we use nearly 50 per cent more wool per capita in our clothing in this country than they do in Great Britain, and we do not use half as much cotton in our clothing as we did 10 years ago.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not desire to prolong this unduly. Does the gentleman mean that we use more wool per capita——

Mr. WEEKS. In other words, the American people consume more woolen clothing.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly; and it is a rich market that the woolen manufacturer has been exploiting for nearly 50 years, and it is a shame on our civilization. It is a shame on the honor of this Government. It is a blot on the Republican Party; and if the party was not already so black, it would show up all over the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEEKS. I do not wish to take the gentleman's time; but I understood the impression was given that when these woolen manufacturers got together they depreciated the value of their product.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I did not say that.

Mr. WEEKS. I wanted to indicate to the gentleman that the value of the product is constantly increasing in this country, and has been for 20 years.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The ouput is greater.

Mr. WEEKS. I am talking about the per capita.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I am talking about the quality of the goods.

Mr. WEEKS. I am, too.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If the people in one country use only one suit per capita of woolen goods every year, and the people in this country use three suits, they consume more per capita; but if those three suits are of inferior quality and not as well made as they would be under competition, as a matter of fact, our people are imposed upon, on account of the lack of quality in the goods. I am not going to take the time to discuss it with the gentleman, but I state that it is a matter of general notoriety, it is a matter that is stated by many men engaged in the business, that in this country the woolen manufacturer does not make a proper quality of goods, that the quality is inferior because of monopoly and, consequently, the lack of competition.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me add one comment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Does not the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Then let us drop the subject.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman will take the census report which was issued the 4th of last April he will find just the contrary to what he states.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. What report is that?

Mr. WEEKS. The census report.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Who furnished it?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know who furnished it. It was the preliminary report of the recent census on wool manufactures.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If the gentleman will investigate he will find that the administration, the census, and all of them take the report that the woolen manufacturers furnish them in reference to this schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is where the trouble comes when trying to get information, trying to find out how these things are. The majority members of the Ways and Means Committee were confronted with the same trouble; the information we got from the Government, that ought to be correct, simply comes from the interested woolen manufacturers.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, if the gentleman wants to fall back and leave it that way, I am willing.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. WEEKS. Absolutely, as far as I know.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Has the gentleman any knowledge on the subject?

Mr. WEEKS. I have no knowledge; but I assume that the Government employees do their duty.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Then, I hope the gentleman will not take up my time in talking about something about which he has no information. I say that is my understanding, that these figures and reports are furnished by the woolen manufacturers, and they are taken by the department, and that has been the case for some years. I do not care to discuss that any further. If the gentleman does not believe it, he may remain a doubting Thomas all his life, but if he will investigate he will find that it is true. The statistics published by the department are made up by the Woolen Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Texas will pardon me, if the gentleman making the cloth only makes 10 cents now with the tariff at the present rate, he will go out of business if this bill passes.

Mr. AMES. That is so. The only way to reduce the price of cloth and cheapen wool is to cut down labor.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That is what they always do. Mr. Chairman, that is the way the manufacturer that wants to be upheld by the Government, that does not understand that men engaged in the manufacturing business ought to be men for all that, that they ought to stand and uphold their business by their own energy and industry, the manufacturers that propose to be hothoused by law always, as soon as circumstances begin to pinch a little financially, want to strike at the laborer every time instead of going to their accounts, inspecting their business methods, and seeing where the leak is.

Mr. AMES. On the contrary, we do not want to reduce the wages of the working people, and that is why we are opposed to this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have never yet been able to find anyone that would say where the laborer ever got an increase by reason of a tax being placed on a commodity. If we were to let the woolen schedule stand like it is, how much protection would the laborer get? Why, the protection, as they call it, amounts to more than the cost of production in England. That is the fact about it.

Mr. AMES. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. AMES. I would like to inform the gentleman that without any pressure from the outside in the mills at home they have increased the wages 37½ per cent in the last 17 years.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not know how low they were to start with, but I hope justice may be done. But it does seem to me that when they talk about protection for the purpose of helping labor they ought to show the country how much of the protection labor gets. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The whole cost of production in England is not equal to the amount of protection you have in many of the items in this particular schedule.

Mr. Chairman, what excuse is there that the poor man should have to give for a blanket not only the value of the blanket but 180 per cent additional? Where is the justification? The tariff on blankets brings in no revenue because it is prohibitive. There are practically no importations. And yet the poor people, the old shivering people, the young, tender, and delicate infants, all must be a prey to the rapacity of the man who contends that Schedule K in the Payne bill ought to remain the law and that this bill ought not to pass in the interest of the country.

Mr. Chairman, frequent interruptions have drawn me far away from the intended course of my remarks. In this connection, however, I will here present opinions from high authority as to the effects on public health by reason of the cruelly exorbitant prices charged for woolen goods under Republican tariffs.

Dr. W. Shropshire, a physician and surgeon of Yoakum, Tex., situated in the wool-growing section, where he has practiced for 20 years, answering my inquiry, wrote, under date of June 15th instant:

> Without doubt the high prices of woolens has very materially curtailed the use of flannels and woolen goods, especially by the poor, and, in so doing, very materially affected the health of that class detrimentally. I can not say just how much, but that, with poor food, makes the death rate of the young of that class double that of the young of the middle class.
>
> The class which suffers most for want of woolen goods is, of course, the poor, and it is the very young babies, from birth to 4 or 5 years of age, that suffer greatest, because of the fact that nature has not had time to immune them to the extreme cold or sudden changes that take place as they go from near-fire to out-door atmosphere. Any amount of cotton or linen clothes can not serve their purpose, because those materials are conductors of heat while wool is a nonconductor.
> The difference of health and mortality that would come of cheap woolen goods would be very material.

I will read you a letter from Dr. Fly, of the firm of Fly, Lumpkin & Thomas, physicians and surgeons, of Amarillo, Tex., of date June 10, 1911. He says:

> I am a graduate of the Kentucky School of Medicine, Louisville, Ky., and have practiced medicine for 17 years—5 in Fort Worth and 12 in Amarillo.
>
> I am of the opinion that the higher price of woolen and flannel goods has curtailed the use of same, and, no doubt, the health and lives of many people have been affected to a greater or lesser degree because of their inability to afford these materials.
>
> The class of people mostly affected are the poor, in the very young and very old, for it is a fact that this class of individuals are more susceptible to atmospheric changes, and it is my opinion that if woolen and flannel goods could be materially reduced in price many more people would be able to use them as wearing apparel, and the class of people most benefited would be the debilitated, or, in other words, those suffering from any form of chronic diseases, by which their resisting forces and vitality are lowered.
> Yours, for suffering humanity, D. R. FLY.

These men stand high in their profession and are prominent in the State.

Is it not an appalling statement that among the young of the poor class the death rate should be double that of the young of the middle class? These letters show that sickness and death are the natural results of the wickedness engrafted into our revenue system by the Payne bill. No wonder that side is ashamed of it. What wonder you try to maintain it. Are your eyes closed to the pallor of dying infancy, and are your ears deaf to the groans of dispairing grief? The decreased use of woolens for the young, taken in connection with poor food, produces an increase of 100 per cent in the death rate over that of the middle class. That is appalling.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Under our present condition, is it not most probably the fact that while our total per capita consumption of wool may be no less than it was years ago, yet that that per capita consumption is largely by the wealthy, and that the poor are getting less and less of the woolen goods?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. There is no doubt of that. It goes to the wealthy and the middle classes, to those who are able to buy the comforts of life, no matter what they may cost. There are a great many people in this country able to buy the comforts of life, and they will buy them so as to make themselves and their family comfortable, even though the price may be outrageously high, even though they have to stint in other matters. But when it comes to the poor, it strikes hard, and it strikes on the death rate—doubles it—that and poor food. But they do not all die. The death rate is doubled; but of those who escape death how many thousands and tens of thousands are doomed to the life of the invalid; how many to rheumatism, consumption, and other chronic and fatal diseases, which are fruitful sources of degeneration, misery, and death? Think of it, every poor child in the land is subjected to the condition that has the effect of doubling the death rate!

Whether the child lives or dies, it is subject to that condition which is constant all over this country. It is not only in Texas, it is not merely in the South, but more intensified in the mountainous country of the West, throughout the great North; and all of your workmen and farmers, the people that you talk about so constantly and profess to love so much, are subjected to this outrage, and yet, with Schedule K staring you in the face, with testimony like this, to be obtained anywhere in the country, you are willing to have that condition stand and to let the death rate go on. Talk to me about "the shame and the glory!" You have the shame and there is no glory to it. You have the money. You have profited enough. It does look as though the manufacturer of woolens to-day ought to stay his hand, that he should listen to the cry of the poor and be willing to bring this schedule down to a basis where the poor man can at least buy at a fair and just rate those things that are necessary to the life and comfort of his family.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, sympathizing as I do with the desire to save the children, does the gentleman think it fair to impose a duty of 45 per cent on cloth for children's clothing and only 40 per cent on cloth for men's clothing?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is he in favor of this bill that imposes an average of 40 per cent on woolens as against the Payne-Aldrich bill, which imposes more than twice that rate?

Mr. MANN. I would be in favor of a protected measure, but as a revenue measure I would not be in favor of putting a higher tariff on children's clothing than on men's clothing.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is the gentleman in favor of this bill, or against the other?

Mr. MANN. I am not in favor of this bill.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Very well; the gentleman is not in favor of this bill, hence he is not in favor of a reduction at all. The Payne-Aldrich bill has 55 per cent ad valorem and 43 per cent added, making 98 per cent, as against 45 per cent in this bill.

Mr. MANN. The question is whether we are doing right in this bill. Admitting that we were not doing right in the Payne-Aldrich bill, are we doing right in this bill? If you want to preserve the lives of the children, does the gentleman think we ought to put a higher tariff on children's clothing than on men's clothing?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman admits the Payne-Aldrich bill to be wrong, he should get right and vote for this bill to correct the evil of the present law. Forty-five per cent with 20 per cent on raw wool is a much better bill than 98 per cent on the finished product and practically 44 per cent on the raw wool.

Mr. GARNER. Will my colleague permit right there? Is not it less onerous on the children who have to pay 45 per cent duty than it is on the children under the present law, where they have to pay 103 per cent duty?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Why, certainly; that is what I stated; the average is about 98 per cent. As a matter of fact, the consumer, the parent, has to pay for it, whether the clothing is for his family or for himself. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. We are making up or have made up, either one you take it, a bill now. Does the gentleman himself, outside the Democratic caucus action, believe that it is wise to put a higher tax on cloth for children's clothes than it is on cloth for men's clothes?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary for me to express myself on the proposition, but to be candid with the gentleman, and as he has expressed a curiosity to know, I will say that personally I should prefer not, but I do not think it lies in the mouth of any Republican who stands for the Payne-Aldrich bill, or Schedule K in it, and who is not going to vote for this bill, to criticize that item. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the tax on cloth, ready-made articles, wearing apparel, is 45 per cent ad valorem. That includes men's clothes, so there is no discrepancy which the gentleman attempts to make appear.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion? I just want to suggest that the distinction made by the gentleman from Illinois seems to me to be utterly without point, from the fact that the father of the family generally buys both the clothes for the women and for the children, and I do not see why it would make any difference to him whether he pays 40 per cent on one and 45 on the other or 45 on one and 40 per cent on the other. He buys the goods.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That is an apt suggestion. In this bill 40 per cent is taken as an average. That is the rate on woolen cloth. Clothing is rated 45 per cent. I do not understand how the gentleman can criticize this bill for being too high when he will not vote for it because it is too low. It is a tweedledum and tweedledee that I can not understand. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor to enlighten the gentleman further as to why I am for the bill. I believe it is only a question of a short time when the people will intrust the Democratic Party with full power in the Government.

If the party is fortunate enough to be wholly Democratic, having no protectionists nor trust-employed Representatives in its ranks, thus free to carry out the people's will without the subtile influence of those who would frustrate its purpose, the Democratic Party will be able to make a tariff bill and raise the revenue necessary to come from this source, and it will not be necessary to tax raw wool. It may not be necessary to tax woolen goods. This idea that the industries of this country must live by taking from the masses of the people by law what they do not get by contract—to force, in other words, the consumers of this country to pay tribute to the business men—is a fetich that can not last among intelligent men in a free country. The feeling aroused by such a system inspires disgust and impels honest men to seek for a better and a more just administration. Honesty is one of the prime virtues. Equal rights to all men is the foundation principle of the Republic. Special privileges to none is the corollary of that proposition. It can not be misunderstood. When you say "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" you are at variance with the very method and purpose and object of the Payne tariff law and the purpose of those who framed it.

Protectionism has been built up by the Republican Party as a sectional as well as a class issue. Protectionism is wrong in itself. It is ruinous as a class measure, and as a sectional issue it has absolutely failed. Its discrimination has purposely favored the North and East as against the South and West. The average man North and East is in no better condition than the ordinary man in the Southern and Western States; and yet we in the South and West have benefited nothing from protection.

Not only that, those who have to live by their labor in protected industries are not so well off as the laboring man is who is engaged in a business where there is no protection. Not only that, but in the protected communities you will find a deplorable condition among the poor who depend on wages, a condition more deplorable than can be found in the South and West, where protection is practically unknown. It is a mistake. It is a failure. It is a curse even to the protected barons themselves. They have degenerated morally and physically, and their families are inferior to those in moderate circumstances. Their ill-gotten money has not done them half the good that would have resulted to them had their intelligence and energy been employed in honest and straightforward business. Cupidity is degenerating—honest methods build up character as well as fortune. You say, "We want to keep our money at home." The beneficiaries of this very system, it is estimated, send abroad every year $300,000,000 to purchase titles and pleasures. Three hundred million dollars per annum amounts to $3,000,000,000 in 10 years. This would build 600,000 miles of graded macadamized road, at a cost of $5,000 per mile, an average of more than 12,000 miles for each State and Territory, giving employment to labor and keeping the money at home. The extravagance of the protective system is appalling. It is enervating as well. Men do not use the same industry, they do not use the same amount of intelligence to hold up the business. They understand it is secured by law and combination. Without a combination, why, of course it would be more trouble. They understand that, and they say, "How foolish it is for us to fight one another. Why not join together and uphold one another?" Thus protectionism and monopoly create and uphold a predatory class which control and sap the industries of the country and absorb its natural resources. Such conditions produce socialism. But the brazen impudence of this ilk is astounding. They propose to legalize these monopolistic combinations that even in the olden time would have been classed as crimes, and that in the present day are crimes under the statute laws of this country. Yet so powerful have these barons become that they smile at the law and defy the administration. They acquire all possible influence with the party in power. They find always some means of ingratiating themselves into every party. They care nothing for any particular party, it is for power that they look.

And they desire, by all means, to get as many into their employment, as many under obligation to them, as possible. By fair means and foul, by hook and by crook, by employing here and there, giving favors and fees, they secure a powerful support.

Men in public life, who never made a dollar above their expenses until they got to Congress, have grown rich. Not only one or two, but numbers of them are in the employment of these interests and roll in wealth.

And the Republican Party has for years—pardon this digression—lined up solidly against my antigraft bill that I have been trying to pass for a long while, the Democrats voting for it and the Republicans against it. The gist of the bill is this: That Senators and Representatives shall not during their term of service receive gifts, employment, fees, and compensation from public-service corporations and others directly interested in legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You stand against that reform. It is only an antibribery law up to date.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Is that a part of the program that has been adopted by the Democratic caucus?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It has not been presented to the House, but will be when we take up general legislation. I have introduced the bill, and I hope the gentleman may have had a change of heart, and that he will support it.

Mr. WEEKS. I have never had a chance to vote on it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The gentleman may not have been in the House, but his party has lined up on it, notably in January, 1908, the Democrats on the one side and the Republicans on the other.

Now that bill is simply an antibribery bill. What is the use in having an antibribery law prohibiting direct bribery if they are permitted to give favors, franks, and other things of value, and, without violating law, can employ Members of Congress, paying them many times more than their salaries? Some of them get rich—acquire thousands and hundreds of thousands and millions—and nobody knows where they get it. If by accident it is found out upon some investigation it is brushed aside with the statement that no law has been violated.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is any worse for a Member of Congress to accept gifts or bribes, if you please, after the election than before the election, while he is a candidate?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not propose to discriminate between such rascality at any time. He is just a scoundrel of the deepest dye if he accepts a bribe at any time, either before election or after. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Has the gentleman any doubt about that matter?

Mr. JACKSON. I would like to ask the gentlemen on the other side if they will again, when opportunity offers, line up solidly against the amendment they once voted for and adopted here, to make public campaign contributions in primary elections?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not know what the gentleman is driving at. I am talking about a material matter.

Mr. JACKSON. If the gentleman will wait until I finish he will understand.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman. I do not think he can base his proofs on——

Mr. JACKSON. Did not the gentlemen on that side of the House line up against an amendment offered on this side of the House that would make public contributions in primary elections for Members of Congress?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri to answer that.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman has referred to the amendment proposed by himself to the publicity bill, I suppose?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does the gentleman believe that that amendment had any merit in it at all?

Mr. JACKSON. I certainly do, and I did when it was offered. Otherwise I would not have introduced it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does the gentleman know that under his amendment any man seeking to be a candidate for Congress could have made his affidavit under the requirements as proposed in his amendment before one single dollar had been expended?

Mr. JACKSON. I do not desire to undertake at this moment to discuss the whole question with the gentleman from Missouri, but——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Oh, I do not care about that discussion going into my remarks. I am talking here, Mr. Chairman, about another question. If the gentleman from Kansas is opposed to my bill, he can remain so. That would be consistent with the action of his side of the House. If the gentleman is for my bill, I shall be very glad to have him help me put it through when it comes up.

Mr. JACKSON. And I will say to the gentleman that I shall be glad to have the gentleman help me put through my amendment providing for publicity of contributions made in primary elections, where, as everyone knows, the actual contest arises in the choice of Democratic Representatives from the South. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If the gentleman will allow me, I will agree that I will be in favor of any bill that has any proper purpose in the way of reasonable regulations. But I know very well that the amendment which the gentleman offered is one that I would not support, because I believe it is one that is fundamentally wrong. I hate to take up all this time outside of the main subject of my argument, but one of my objections to it is that it would give the Federal Government an opportunity to interfere with the local primary elections in my State, and I do not propose to do that if I can help it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. Do I understand the gentlemen on that side of the House to——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not propose to take up my time in the discussion of the amendment offered by the gentleman. I am against it, and I have told the gentleman why. I do not want the gentleman to take up my time. I am not at all out of humor, but I simply mean what I say. I would rather go on. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, returning to my antigraft bill, there is no use in saying that we have a law against bribery, since, when a party is found out, he can say, "This was a gift, this was a fee, this was employment and compensation." So my bill is an antibribery bill up to date, and I tell you now that you will never get the influence of the trust magnates removed from this Congress until you make it a felony for them to attempt to employ one of the servants of the people. That is the only way to do it; and, furthermore, to make it a penal offense for any servant of the people to receive such employment or gift after he comes here with a commission from the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. I am a new Member. Has that occurred frequently in the House or in another body? I thought they were all honorable men.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to inquire whether my bill has been up frequently?

Mr. SLOAN. No; the gentleman referred to a number of men, or a great many men, who came here——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Oh, I understand the gentleman's question. He wants to know whether such gifts and employment are frequent.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not know of my own knowledge just how frequent they are, but I have it from Republican authority——

Mr. SLOAN. Which usually is the best on earth.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That that side of the House was honeycombed with that sort of employment.

Mr. SLOAN. Any of it from Texas?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. There is no one on that side from Texas. All the Members of the Texas delegation are on this side of the aisle. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMS. Let me make a statement for the gentleman's encouragement. I introduced a bill and sent it to the Committee on the District of Columbia to make it unlawful for a Member of the House or Senate to own stock in any public-service corporation doing business in the District of Columbia, and it could not even get backdoor notice.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That is a good proposition.

Mr. SIMS. I want to encourage the gentleman about his bill.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have occupied the time of the committee much longer than I intended. Many things I intended to discuss must be omitted on account of many interruptions and consequent digressions. I want to thank the gentlemen who have listened so long and patiently and who have given me such courteous hearing—gentlemen on both sides of the aisle. If I have not yielded to each as much as he desired, I call attention to the lateness of the hour.

I have not had an opportunity to explain all the changes in this bill. Suffice it to say that the bill reduces to the consumer very materially the cost of woolen goods. I believe with the committee that this bill will raise nearly the revenue that the present tariff does, with less than half the tax upon the people. I myself do not believe that it will produce $40,000,000 of revenue; but those who are competent to judge say that it will. I think it will produce probably about $35,000,000 or $36,000,000. No man can tell with certainty.

Mr. WEEKS. Under this bill there will necessarily be more wool imported than there has been in the past, will there not?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I do not know, but I think so. It is so very late, Mr. Chairman, that I would not like to go into a discussion of the details of that. I believe there will be an increased consumption of wool. I believe the people who can scarcely afford to buy these high-priced woolen goods will go into the market, at a reasonable price, and that the consumption of woolen goods will be greater than it has ever been known in this country.

The population of the country is increasing. We have a wonderfully wealthy country, and I believe that the consumption of wool will be greater and that the imports of the manufactured article will be greatly increased, and by that means the amount of the tariff we shall get will be considerable. It may be as much as $40,000,000. The Democrats in the House are, step by step, redeeming the party pledges.

Before I take my seat, Mr. Chairman, I will say there is one thing I should not overlook. The frequent allusion by gentlemen on that side to a gentleman for whom I am not a spokesman or mouthpiece, but for whom I have the highest respect, challenges my attention. From time to time I have heard slurring remarks come across the aisle in reference to the most distinguished Democrat in this country, and it has grated on my nerves. No matter how we may differ in reference to our political views, all men should recognize true manhood and merit wherever they see it. And if there ever was a man in this country who stood out fairly and openly for what he believed, and who expressed clearly the views on each side of every question he discussed, and who stated with clearness and fairness the arguments for and against, that man is W. J. Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yet he is abused and hated. I know nothing like it since, in ancient times, Aristides was banished from Athens by a popular vote. His ability and probity stood preeminent. He was called "the Just." But he was banished. If the protectionists and grafters could have their way, Mr. Bryan would have to seek some foreign clime.

Mr. Bryan is a devoted Democrat, he is a patriot, he is a Christian gentleman, and he stands high in the United States and in all the civilized world. Why any man should speak slightingly of him I do not know, and I can not understand why gentlemen on that side should refer to him with unfriendly slurs. I suppose that is the price men have to pay for greatness. As Byron expressed it:

> He who ascends to mountain tops shall find
> The loftiest peaks most wrapped in clouds and snow;
> He who surpasses or subdues mankind
> Must look down on the hate of those below.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, in the future vicissitudes of this Nation, in the calm and in the storm, when reason rules or passion sways, this same man Bryan will, in all the days to come, stand as a tower of Democratic strength, an impersonation of civic righteousness.

> Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
> Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm;
> Though round his breast the rolling clouds are spread,
> Eternal sunshine settles on his head.

[Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duty on wools and woolen manufactures, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WARBURTON, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for four weeks, on account of important business.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That is simply for debate this evening?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And nothing else.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman intend to make a request for closing debate on the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would be glad to make a request if it will be agreed to. I intended to move to close debate on Tuesday morning. The session of Monday will be devoted to the Discharge Calendar. However, I will make the request that when the House adjourns to-day general debate on H. R. 11019 be closed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is fair to the House to have some understanding. I think myself it is fair to say that we will close debate to-night if that is the intention.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the intention.

Mr. MANN. And to commence reading the bill on Tuesday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wools and woolen manufactures close with to-night's session. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that we take the recess until 7.30 o'clock this evening, so as to give half an hour more for debate. I therefore modify my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House take a recess until 7.30 o'clock this evening, the night session to be devoted to debate on the bill.

The motion was considered and agreed to.

The SPEAKER designated Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas as Speaker pro tempore for the evening session.

Accordingly, at 5.30 o'clock, the House took a recess until 7.30 o'clock this evening.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas].

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11019, to revise the wool schedule.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the wool-schedule bill, with Mr. BOOHER in the chair.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, down here in Congress the Democrats are being abused by the Republicans for selling out to we fellows from the sheep States, and out home we fellows from the sheep States are being abused because the sell out was not complete, so it seems to be a case of "be damned if you do and be damned if you don't." Some people seem to be particularly hard to satisfy in the making up of this schedule, but the more I listen to the lamentations arising from the Republican side of the House over the "gross betrayal" of Democratic principles involved in this 20 per cent ad valorem duty on wool, the more I am beginning to suspect that this duty on wool is not such an awfully bad thing after all for we fellows from the sheep States. Indeed, I have a suspicion that if it was such a bad thing for us, there would not be so much lamentation from that side of the House about the betrayal of Democratic principles, but, in that event, it would be the principles themselves that would get the lambasting.

Mr. Chairman, at home I have a little daughter, and she is all the daughter that I have got. She constitutes my family. I have not seen her since the 22d day of last November. This last week she attained her eighteenth year, which in Colorado makes her not only a woman, but also a man, gives her all of the rights that her father ever possessed under the laws of that State, and some that he does not. In addition to that, she graduated and completed her school studies. In addition to that, she had the honor of the leading rôle in the commencement play, and while I never even had the pleasure of hearing her recite, "Twinkle, twinkle, little star," I passed up all of those things and stayed down here in Washington watching and participating in these debates—all for the final purpose of discussing Schedule K for 30 minutes to a vast quantity of furniture. [Laughter.] I felt if I were to be out in Colorado while the Democrats were down here taking the tariff off wool the Republicans would be taking the hide off me. But, as I stated in the opening, I perhaps had practically as well be there because our friends the enemy seem to have made up their minds not to be satisfied with this schedule anyway. Whether it carries no tariff, whether it carries 20 per cent or 30 per cent or whatever it carries, it is going to be a Democratic wool tariff, and that will be sufficient to condemn it in their eyes.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to have this cup pass from me—the responsibility of putting anything in the RECORD on this subject, under the probability that I can not please anybody. I never before appreciated the advantage of a seat over here on the Cherokee strip, when I have to make a speech that can not possibly please anybody, because, under the circumstances existing now, there are few on this side to resent the flings and arrows I may direct against them, and the other side of the House, where I really belong, is too far away for them to return any flings and arrows that may be sent in that direction.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that when I made my first campaign for Congress there was then on in this country the tariff agitation that resulted in the Payne bill, and when I made my second campaign for Congress one of the leading issues in that campaign was a revision of the Payne bill itself, and yet I never made a speech on the tariff, either in or out of Congress. I did not become a Democrat, Mr. Chairman, because of the tariff policy of the Democratic Party.

I became a Democrat because I believed that party in its makeup, in its leadership, in its sympathies, and in its principles was nearer than the Republican Party to the great toiling and producing masses of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is why I became a Democrat, and Mr. Chairman, I have never had any cause to regret my action or to revise or change my opinion. It is quite a practice with Democrats, and I suppose with Republicans since that party has taken on age, to launch out in campaign speeches and in conventions with the assertion that they have always been Democrats. But I am not able to say that, and if there can be credit due a party in augmenting its numbers by accession rather than by birth, I think it is worth something to the party and something of which it may more properly boast, that here and there is a man who was not born a Democrat, but who, after obtaining his maturity and such judgment as it may have pleased nature to bestow upon him, elected to cast his fortune and affiliate with the party because he believed that of the two great parties it was closer to the masses of the people from which he sprang. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is true that I subscribe generally to the tariff theories of the Democratic Party, but I came to this body as nearly open-minded and nonpartisan upon this subject as could well be, and without having in mind any theory of tariff taxation into which all facts must fit or any hard-and-fast rule which must apply in all cases. I came rather in that state of mind where a man might favor a protective tariff, a revenue tariff, or free trade, as the case might be, and while this state of mind might not be in accord with the traditional policies of either of the two great political parties, as declared in their successive platforms, it is my observation that it has been to some extent in accord with the performance of the two great parties and to a still greater extent in accord with the individual actions of a very respectable number of the representatives in Congress of these parties.

THE REPUBLICAN TARIFF POLICY.

In the first place, neither of the parties has consistently adhered to its declared tariff policy. In its last declaration upon this subject, the Republican Party in its platform of 1908 said:

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

I can find no place in such a declaration for the proposal of a Republican President to place upon the free list the products of the farm and throw open the markets of this country to the only present and prospective competitor of the American farmer. I can find no place in a policy of protection thus specifically defined—for absolute free trade under the guise of reciprocity.

I heartily supported and voted for Canadian reciprocity, and would be equally glad to support absolute free trade with Canada. Not because I believe that reciprocity with Canada will appreciably reduce the cost of living to the people of this country, but because of the closer and better trade relations that will be thereby established between them; because there are no natural barriers, and, therefore, should be no artificial barriers between the two countries. But the Republican Party has been steeping the American farmer in the belief that his prosperity is almost wholly dependent upon a high protective tariff, and is even now filling those of the American farmers who raise sheep and produce wool with the false fear that the Democratic Party is about to wantonly destroy that industry through a reduction of the tariff; and I am unable to see where free wheat has any more place than free wool in such a doctrine. All these years the Republican Party has been giving the farmer a tariff of 25 cents per bushel upon his wheat. It now tells him that this duty was of no benefit. How is he to know that it will not next negotiate reciprocity treaties with South America, wherein wool will play the part now being played by lumber and its products in Canadian reciprocity? All American products, whether of the mine or the mill or the farm, are produced under the same economic conditions in every material respect, and a free list upon any American product, by whatever name that free list may be called, has no place in the policy of protection.

THE DEMOCRATIC TARIFF POLICY.

But little less difficulty has been experienced by the Democratic Party in its policy of a tariff for revenue only, in which a free list has no more logical place than in the policy of protection, and which must result in heavier duties upon those things taxed for revenue purposes. It is conceded that any duty levied upon a competitive product is to that extent protective, and there is no escape from this proposition. About one-third of the total revenues of the Government is derived through tariff taxation, and if it is the purpose of the Democratic Party, as it seems, to maintain this source of revenue and the tax necessary to derive this revenue is to be laid principally upon things produced in this country, it follows that the amount of incidental protection will approximate the direct protection contemplated by the Republicans. Such incidental protection, I maintain, ought to be equitably distributed, if not for the avowed purpose of protection, at least for the purpose of equity and to prevent one competitive article from receiving much incidental protection because another receives none. A free list of noncompetitive articles may be consistent with the theory of protection to American products, but a free list strikes me as inconsistent with any theory of a tariff for revenue, which, to be equitable, must be uniformly distributed over every subject of taxation. I do not mean this in any spirit of criticism of either party, but merely as showing what necessarily and inevitably happens to a theory when confronted with a condition.

INDIVIDUAL INCONSISTENCY.

When you consider the action of individual representatives of the two parties, you find no less inconsistency. During the passage of the Payne bill, the views of the individual Representative might be more safely forecasted by the products of his locality than by his party affiliations. New England protectionists were solidly for free hides and Texas tariff reformers were as solidly against it. Kansas wanted free lumber and protected wheat. Republicans from the prairie States wanted $1 per thousand on rough lumber for protection, and Democrats from the timber States wanted $2 per thousand for revenue.

And so it went. In many cases it was a question as to whose ox was gored. In this session of Congress we have witnessed that splendid fighting body of independent Republicans go to pieces on the rock of reciprocity, disorganized among themselves, and fallen from the grace of the agency of publicity which was their chief source of support; all because reciprocity proposed to give them free wheat, of which they produce much, along with free lumber, of which they produce none.

NEW ENGLAND TARIFF REFORM—FREE RAW MATERIAL.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to the flaw, if such it be, in my own armor. I am not a New England tariff reformer. The doctrine of the New England tariff reformer has been made perfectly clear in tariff legislation. It is free trade in raw materials and protection upon manufactures. From a tariff standpoint, there is no such thing as raw material. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Raw material is a manufacturing, not a tariff, term. Used as a tariff term, raw material is an absolutely misleading misnomer. The moment labor or capital is applied to the resources of nature, that moment the yields of nature cease to be raw material, so far as the tariff is concerned. This proposition is so obvious and elementary to me that discussion of it would be wasted upon me.

I am not now arguing for a revenue tariff or for a tariff for protection, but I am simply stating what has become to my mind a transparent, obvious fact, and that is from a revenue or tariff standpoint there is and can be no such thing as raw material, but that the term is solely and only a manufacturing term.

FREE HIDES—IRON ORE—COAL.

The only result heretofore, if any, of free raw materials in tariff legislation has been to increase the margin of protection and swell the profits of the manufacturer. Take the case of hides. In the Payne bill we placed hides on the free list and reduced boots and shoes correspondingly, and hides have gone down and boots and shoes have gone up. Nobody can dispute this. I will insert here in my remarks the provisions of the Dingley law and of the Payne bill upon hides, boots, and shoes as these items appeared in the various stages of the bill from its introduction to its final passage:

HIDES OF CATTLE—BOOTS AND SHOES—DINGLEY LAW.

HIDES OF CATTLE.

SEC. 437. Hides of cattle, raw or uncured, whether dry, salted, or pickled, 15 per cent ad valorem.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

SEC. 438. Boots and shoes made of leather, 25 per cent ad valorem; provided that leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles shall be classified as manufactures of leather and pay duty accordingly.

THE PAYNE BILL AS INTRODUCED.

HIDES OF CATTLE—FREE LIST.

SEC. 581. Hides of cattle, raw or uncured, whether dry, salted, or pickled.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

SEC. 448. Boots and shoes made of leather, and leather shoe laces, finished or unfinished, 15 per cent ad valorem, provided that leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles (and Gauffre leather) shall be classified as manufactures of leather and pay duty accordingly.

This shows that the Payne bill as introduced proposed to remove hides from the dutiable list of 15 per cent ad valorem and place them on the free list, and to reduce boots and shoes from 25 to 15 per cent ad valorem.

THE PAYNE BILL AS AMENDED IN THE SENATE.

HIDES OF CATTLE.

SEC. 447½. Hides of cattle, raw or uncured, whether dry, salted, or pickled, 15 per cent ad valorem.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

SEC. 448. Boots and shoes made of leather, 20 per cent ad valorem, provided that leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles (and Gauffre leather) shall pay a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem in addition to the duty imposed by this paragraph on leather of the same character as that from which they are cut.

This shows that the Senate proposed to retain the 15 per cent ad valorem duty on hides and reduce boots and shoes from 25 to 20 per cent ad valorem, with an additional duty of 15 per cent ad valorem on the forms of leather mentioned in the proviso, instead of taxing such forms as "manufactures of leather."

THE PAYNE BILL AS AGREED TO BY THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

HIDES OF CATTLE.

SEC. 450. Hides of cattle, raw or uncured, whether dry salted or pickled, shall be admitted free of duty: Provided, That sole leather made from such hides shall pay a duty of 5 per cent ad valorem; that grain, bugg, and split leather made from such hides shall pay a duty of 7½ per cent ad valorem; that boots and shoes, the upper leather of which is made wholly or in chief value from such hides, shall pay a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem; that harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather made from such hides, shall pay a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

SEC. 451. Boots and shoes made of leather, 15 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles (and gauffre leather) shall pay a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem in addition to the duty imposed by this paragraph on leather of the same character as that from which they are cut.

THE PAYNE BILL AS FINALLY ENACTED.

HIDES OF CATTLE—FREE LIST.

SEC. 581. Hides of cattle, raw or uncured, whether dry salted or pickled.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

SEC. 448. Boots and shoes made of leather, 15 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles (and gauffre leather) shall be classified as manufactures of leather and pay duty accordingly.

This shows that the Payne bill on hides of cattle, boots, and shoes became a law just as originally introduced, placing hides on the free list and reducing boots and shoes from 25 to 15 per cent ad valorem, and only changing the Dingley law by the insertion into the proviso of the words "and gauffre leather."

The Government lost about $2,000,000 annually in tariff revenues by removing the 15 per cent ad valorem duty on hides, and no consumer of the manufactures of leather has been benefited one cent. Where did the tariff go? What has become of the $2,000,000 of which the Treasury of the United States was deprived? In the Payne bill we lowered the duties on coal and iron ore and rough lumber. I do not know what losses the Treasury sustained by the reductions, but I do know what gains the consumer of the finished products made. He gained nothing. There is one theory, and only one, upon which the doctrine of free raw materials can be justified, and that is that the Government shall follow up by some action to see that the consumer and not the trust gets the benefit.

It has been said in a sort of joking way here, Mr. Chairman, that the Representatives from Colorado are between the devil and the deep blue sea because we have got a lot of sheep in our State and have been "steam rollered" into supporting this bill; but, Mr. Chairman, the most dangerous issue that can come out of this legislation would not be, in my judgment, a reduction of the price of raw wool. The most dangerous issue would be that wool should depreciate, and the Treasury be deprived of the revenue, which was the case with placing hides upon the free list, not by a Democratic but by a Republican Congress at the instance of a Republican President; and then, as in the case of boots and shoes, for clothing, I will not say go up, but to even remain stationary; that, in my judgment, would be the most disastrous outcome that could overtake this legislation.

THE TARIFF AS AN ISSUE.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to a personal view of the tariff which I have hesitated in my own mind to state. The tariff is the piece de resistance of American politics. It is the perennial issue. In the minds of many it is the paramount issue, but to my mind it has become the paramount humbug. So far as affording the relief expected of tariff legislation, it is an ignis fatuus, and only serves to distract and divert public attention from the really great and vital issues crying for solution. It holds the boards and is kicked back and forth while the great trusts, both protected and unprotected, grow and grow. It was an issue when this country was a poverty-stricken handful of States along the Atlantic seacoast, given almost wholly to pastoral pursuits and able to compete with no nation anywhere; it is an issue when we have become the greatest industrial power in the world, able to compete with all nations everywhere, and it is no nearer solution now than then. It is a very corpse of an issue, and I favor a substantial tariff reduction, in large part upon the ground that the people, seeing no substantial relief, will give it burial and turn their attention to the great living issues ripening now for solution, but unborn when the tariff had become hoary with age.

Mr. Chairman, this country has recently produced a great school of reformers, born out of the industrial evolution of this generation, but not one of them has won the attention of the country or made any contribution to progress upon the tariff. Production of wealth has become a science, but the distribution of wealth remains an enigma. The great captains of industry, through combination and invention, have brought production to an almost perfect standard of system, efficiency, and economy, but all for their own profit. The father who worked in the mills at Pittsburg 40 years ago got a little plain food for his belly, a little plain clothes for his back, a little plain shelter over his head, and his employer counted his wealth by hundreds of thousands; the son working there to-day gets just what the father got, but the employer counts his wealth by hundreds of millions. And that employer has come before the great committee of this Congress and has told this Congress that it could take all the tariff off his industry; that he did not need it.

Mr. Chairman, I presume I am in as close touch with the men in the ranks as any man in this body and that I have spent as much time—12 years at hard manual labor—as any other Member. When I was in the ranks I did not talk tariff and the men in the ranks with me did not talk tariff. We did not measure public men by their tariff views, of which views there appears to be nearly as many varieties as there are public men. Some of the great labor organizations of the country have headquarters here in Washington. These organizations are not petitioning Congress about the tariff. Neither are the others. They are not particularly interested by what method you raise $40,000,000 annually on Schedule K. They are operating the great industrial enginery of the country and no solution of the tariff will settle one single issue which has brought about and built up these great combinations of workingmen.

The great issue in this country is to harness the great engines of production, so that they shall work for all instead of for a few, and the men who are making an impress upon the thought of this country are the men who, in city, State, and Nation, have made some contribution to the solution of this question.

TAKE THE TARIFF OUT OF POLITICS.

I have said no solution of the tariff will solve the issues of the wage earner. There is a possible solution that may incidentally help him. Mr. Chairman, the views to which I have given expression impel me in the direction of action which will remove the tariff as far as possible from politics. It is a subject so complex and intricate that it can never be understood by the masses of the people save in a general and vague way; and even their Representatives can not get that thorough and practical knowledge of it to insure intelligent action.

I was reading the other day the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee of the last House of a statesman of national repute who was the especial advocate of wool in Congress for many years. He brushed aside the first question about manufactured wool by saying he knew nothing about the subject. He next admitted that he knew nothing about foreign raw wools. All he knew was a little about sheep raising in this country, and probably the most of that was paper knowledge. But he was no more ignorant of the details of the subject than many more of us—not so ignorant as some of us.

I am inclined, therefore, toward the establishment of a permanent body specially qualified to study this question and shall favor some practical form of tariff board. But my main reason for favoring this reform will be that Congress and the country may be permitted greater opportunity to study and act upon subjects that I consider much more vital than the tariff to the permanent well-being of the people.

FREE RAW WOOL AND PROTECTED MANUFACTURES.

Some views, however, of the tariff generally and of wool in particular have been expressed by Members on both sides of the House to which I can not subscribe and the logic of which I can not follow, even though I am supporting this bill.

Several members of the Ways and Means Committee favor free raw wool. These same gentlemen stand for a duty on manufactures of wool, and explain this apparent discrimination by saying that as to manufactured wool we must have the revenue, but none of these gentlemen has put forward the claim that the woolen mills in this country could operate under free trade, and not one of them, were he given the power and responsibility, would bring in a bill at once transferring all woolen manufactures to the free list, regardless of the question of revenue. Confronted with such responsibility, he would say that the Democratic policy was a gradual reduction to a revenue basis, and that the woolen industry, having been built upon and adjusted to present tariff rates, its sudden transition to the free list would be disastrous to business.

My logic teaches me that a duty is needed on both or neither, as both are produced under identical conditions in every particular. And right here I apply—and I believe the majority of the people apply—the rule of treating each case on its own merits and according to the needs and conditions of the particular product. We have high rates of duty on manufactures of steel and upon everything entering into the composition of steel manufactures, and yet we are competing in the markets of the world on nearly all manufactures of steel, whether locomotives or sewing machines, whether steam threshers or hoes, whether rails or nails, whether stoves or watches; and this fact indicates that we might entirely dispense with the duty on this class of manufactures and upon these schedules.

But nobody will claim that we have at any time, under any conditions, competed with the world in the manufacture of cloth; nor can it be claimed that the removal of the small duty, entering into the raw wool of cloth, will enable our manufacturers to enter into the world competition now enjoyed by the steel industry. Furthermore, it has been pointed out that while this bill carries 20 per cent ad valorem duty on raw wool and 42½ per cent on manufactures of wool, the Wilson bill carried free raw wool and duties of 48 per cent ad valorem on manufactures of wool, or more than twice the actual protection on manufactured wool carried in this bill, thereby clearly indicating the belief of the Democatic Party at that time that fairly high rates of duty must be maintained on woolen manufactures, even with free raw materials. I am, therefore, willing, both on account of raw wool and manufactured wool, to take into consideration the state of the industry itself, here and abroad, and to make allowance for the difference found to exist in the conditions affecting it.

THE PEOPLE WILL REGARD THE HOME INDUSTRY.

And let me say that the people will consider these things; they will regard the home industry. I do not at all follow—and the majority of the people will not follow—those who in the making of a tariff bill place the woolen industry of this country in the same category with rubber and silk, as has been suggested. It has been suggested that the duty to be realized from raw wool might be realized from raw rubber and raw silk, of which we import large quantities, and of which we produce none. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand the statesmanship which does not take into account an established industry which is a substantial item in our list of national assets and a component part of our resources. If there are two sources from which I may derive revenue, one of which we do not produce and the other of which we produce in competition with much cheaper conditions of production elsewhere, and the placing of the tax wholly upon the noncompetitive source will seriously injure the home product, I will at least levy the tax upon the home product up to the point which still leaves it open to foreign competition. And this is exactly the case with raw wool, of which we produce 55 per cent and import 45 per cent, showing conclusively that raw wool is on a competitive basis. And I may add that if every article of consumption in this country was upon the same competitive basis as raw wool there would not be any serious tariff-reform issue and there would not be any extra session of Congress. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen who represent a practical people, a people who are interested in results and not theories, should go slowly in saying that in framing a tariff bill they leave wholly out of their calculations the American industry, because the people will consider these things; and they should be considered. No sane man would want to destroy an American industry, even though the argument as to dollars and cents was on that side of the ledger. The future welfare, unforeseen emergencies here and abroad—these and many other considerations would move for its preservation; and I for one am in favor of preserving it.

WOOL A PRECARIOUS INDUSTRY.

Nor do I follow those gentlemen who want free wool on the ground that wool is the gift of God; that the production of wool is largely the act of God. I know little about the sheep industry in this country, but I know more than that. And if you were to tell the herdsman in the mountain wastes, struggling with his flock through storms, fighting drouth and snow and wild beasts and disease, that the clip from the backs of his herd was the gift of God, you would better tell him by mail; it would be safer. And yet I have heard free wool argued for as the gift of God, like water, air, and sunshine. It would be more in consonance with the facts, Mr. Chairman, to argue for free wool on the ground that its production in this country is so precarious and uncertain of profitable returns and so unable to compete with South America and Australia, that it ought to be let go by the board; but since the advocates of free wool have seen fit to take the other position, we shall not only let them maintain it, but shall insist upon its maintenance by them, knowing full well that it has no basis in fact and that our salvation lies rather in the direction of the facts as I have suggested them.

THE UNRELIABILITY OF STATISTICS.

All tariff speeches are replete with figures and statistics, and I observe that it requires tables of statistics to round out any properly proportioned speech on the wool schedule. During this debate I have asked some questions, which in some instances have generated a little heat, with a view to establishing the unreliability of statistics, as well as with a view, in case the figures should prove reliable, to arrive at a conclusion in my own mind. And I think, perhaps, I could make no more serviceable contribution to this debate than to instance some statistics which I believe go at least to raise a substantial doubt as to whether gentlemen upon either side of this Chamber or upon either side of the pending measure can, with even measurable accuracy, forecast the effect of this legislation upon the wool and woolen industries of this country.

I may add that in making these inquiries from the time this measure was presented to the Democratic caucus, I have not confined myself to those gentlemen who have taken some particular side of this subject, but have indiscriminately questioned those who favor the proposed rate of 20 per cent ad valorem upon raw wool, those who favor the present specific duty of 11 cents per pound, and those who favor free raw wool.

The other day the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the able and well-informed minority leader, was quoting some figures to show that in order to raise the revenue upon Schedule K, estimated by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, it would be necessary to increase the imports of wool into this country some 202,000,000 pounds, taking both the raw wool necessary to raise $13,000,000 and the wool in the manufactures necessary to raise $27,000,000, or the total of $40,000,000 contemplated in Schedule K. Prior to that time I had done some figuring myself upon the estimates made in the minority report on the pending bill going to show that imports of raw and manufactured wool must increase nearly 190,000,000 pounds in order to realize the amount of revenue estimated by the majority. Now, in the fiscal year 1910 we consumed in this country, in round numbers, 581,000,000 pounds of wool, of which, in round numbers, we produced 321,000,000 pounds and imported 264,000,000 pounds, a production of 55 per cent and an importation of 45 per cent of the total consumption for that year.

Assuming that the consumption during the first year under the proposed law would be practically the same and that the increased importations would displace a like quantity of domestic wool, I found that instead of producing 55 per cent of the total consumption we would produce but 22½ per cent, and if the figures of the gentleman from Illinois are correct, it would force the domestic production down to about 20 per cent.

I said at the time, and I repeat, that it would be safe to go upon record with the prediction that no such decrease in the production of American wool will occur under this bill, nor will the reduction sufficiently approximate the estimated displacement to give any weight whatever to mere tables of figures indicating that this result will be brought about. On the other hand, in so far as the increase in importations fall short of the figures given, to that extent will the new Schedule K fail to realize the revenues produced by the present schedule.

This, in my judgment, is what will actually occur: Domestic wool will lose its place in the percentage column by reason of increased importations, but these increased importations will be in a substantial measure taken up by increased consumption and the decrease in the quantity of domestic wool will be relative rather than actual. And if, as asserted by the advocates of free wool, the manufacturers of this country are given access to wool supplies which are now practically denied them and which may be advantageously mixed with the domestic wools, thereby stimulating American manufacture, the depressive result upon domestic raw wool will be still less noticeable.

And here is another element that should not be overlooked. The world's wool supply is fairly fixed. There is not sufficient wool in the world to supply the demand; at least there is not a surplus; at least it may be said of wool as of other textiles and of food products that the marvelous growth of a greater use of these things has caused the price of them to increase everywhere, with demand ever more closely treading upon the heels of supply. The world's wool production is about 2,854,000,000 pounds per annum. This country consumes about 600,000,000 pounds of that total. Does anyone imagine that the wool manufacturers of Europe will sit by and permit the diversion into this country of 200,000,000 pounds of wool per annum now going into those countries, or even of the 103,000,000 pounds of raw wool estimated by the minority, without bidding in the markets for their share of it? Would not such a falling off of the supply of raw wool in the manufacturing centers of Europe inevitably tend to sustain prices? Then, if these increased importations are to have the effect of reducing the domestic source of supply, it must work a reduction of the total raw-wool supply of the world and an inevitable sharpening of demand and increase of prices.

I believe we are going to have increased importations of both raw and manufactured wools under this schedule; otherwise it would be useless to enact it, and our producers of both raw and manufactured wools are going to be brought into sharper competition with the woolgrowers and manufacturers of the world, and I mention the foregoing considerations for the purpose of suggesting not only that you can not spell the ruin of the wool industry in this country out of a table of figures, but as suggesting that there are compensating benefits which will in a very large measure counterbalance on one side of the ledger the losses to be noted on the other, to say nothing of the millions who must benefit by better if not by cheaper clothing and of increased commerce with the world at large.

THE TARIFF AND WOOL PRICES.

There are other figures from which it is just as difficult as those I have given to predicate the effect of a tariff rate. The other day I sought to interrupt the gentleman from Wyoming when he was taking the position that the production of wool required stable conditions, and that conditions were stable except in the face of Democratic tariff revision, and I shall insert in my remarks what I then wished to call to his attention, namely, the testimony of one J. M. Wilson, of Douglas, Wyo., who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee during the framing of the Payne bill and stated that he represented the National Woolgrowers' Association. Mr. Wilson said, at page 5035 of the hearings, that in 1907 their wool brought 22¾ cents per pound and in 1908 15¾ cents per pound, a slump of fully one-third in the market price of wool within a period of 12 months.

Mr. Peter G. Johnson, a representative of the Idaho woolgrowers, testified at the same hearings, and at page 5074 gave the following prices for Idaho raw wool:

	Cents per pound.
1903	12½
1904	15
1905	18½
1906	18½
1907	20
1908	15

Mr. J. A. Delfelder, of Wyoming, a woolgrower, testified, at page 5109, to the following prices of raw wool:

	Cents per pound.
1905	13½
1906	17
1907	18
1908	15

I do not believe that, leaving partisanship aside, any man can fairly contend that the fear of free raw wool in 1908, with the Republican Party overwhelmingly in power in every branch of the National Government, with the United States Senate two to one Republican, had anything whatever to do with the slump in wool. The slump in wool in 1908, in my judgment, was more likely due to the panic of 1907, although I am somewhat perplexed in attributing it in part to that cause by the fact that even during and long after the panic of 1907, there was a continued advance in prices upon all commodities and upon all necessaries of life.

I notice also that some of our western woolgrowers placed a very low valuation on wool for the year 1903, indicating that it received little benefit from the present duty. Mr. Johnson, whose figures I have already stated, placed it at 12½ cents per pound, and he was corroborated by Mr. E. S. Erickson, of Salt Lake City, who said that he represented the Utah Woolgrowers' Association, and stated, at page 5062, that Utah wool in 1903 was worth 12 cents per pound. This, by the way, was six years after the Wilson law had been replaced by the Dingley law, giving ample time for clearing the American markets of any stored importations under the Wilson law.

Mr. Chairman, when I scanned the testimony in the hearings upon the Payne bill, showing the low prices of wool which prevailed throughout the Rocky Mountain States during the years the Dingley law has been in force, the question naturally arose in my mind as to what extent our woolgrowers were being benefited by the specific duty of 11 cents per pound upon raw wool. I have not exhausted the testimony upon this subject. One of the principal woolgrowers in my State testified that he sold his wool in 1908 for 12 cents. The largest woolgrower in New Mexico gave his sale prices over a period of years in the nineteen hundreds, and these prices ranged from 11 cents to 13 cents. A Member of this House from one of the Coast States, a very large producer of wool, says that he sold his clip last year for 13 cents per pound. I remember hearing Colorado woolgrowers, in the campaign of 1908, complaining bitterly that their wool and sheep market was the lowest and poorest it had been for years. Indeed, I heard general reports to the effect that it was the worst it had ever been. Arguments as to causes may be as many as there are those to argue, but one fact stands out clearly and above dispute, and that is that the duty of 11 cents per pound upon domestic raw wool has not been worth 11 cents per pound to the wool producers and it has not been worth half of 11 cents per pound, and I have heard men who assumed to speak with knowledge estimate the actual benefit of this duty in market prices to the domestic wool producer as low as 2 cents per pound. Another Member of this body is advised by woolgrowers in his State that they receive no benefit whatever from the specific duty, and they base this claim on the ground of the great difference in shrinkage between our western wools and many imported wools, and they explain it in this way: They say that whereas our western wools shrink on an average two-thirds and even as much as three-fourths in being reduced from the unwashed to the scoured state, much of this foreign wool shrinks only from one-fourth to one-third in the scouring process, and these foreign woolgrowers take advantage of the specific duty of 11 cents per pound upon unwashed wools by bringing their wool in in this condition and scouring it afterwards.

If the foreign wool shrinks only 25 per cent in the scouring process, it will be seen that the importer after scouring his pound of unwashed wool has left three-quarters of a pound of scoured wool, upon which he has paid a duty of 11 cents; whereas had he imported his wool in the scoured state under the 33 cents per pound rate for scoured wool as fixed in the Dingley law, he would have paid for that quantity of wool three-fourths of 33 cents, or practically 25 cents, a net saving of 14 cents upon his three-quarters of a pound of wool, which would mean a net saving of practically 20 cents per pound; and this is the sort of competition the domestic woolgrower with his great shrinkage is called upon to meet under the Dingley law. The scoured-wool rate of 33 cents per pound in the Dingley law therefore is not a protection to the American woolgrower, but a delusion and a snare, just as much so as the exorbitant compound duties upon all manufactures containing even a shred of wool in their composition. It is said there is such an infinite variety of wools as to make the ad valorem duty difficult of application, and that the ideal method would be the fixing of raw-wool duties upon a scoured basis, but I believe the ad valorem method to be much more nearly fair to the American producer than the specific duty, and I therefore favor this method as against the specific rate.

Another item in the list of uncertainties as to the effect of a given tariff rate upon the domestic product is the fact that while the number of sheep in the United States in 1903, when there was no Democratic tariff agitation, is given as approximately 64,000,000, the number had fallen in 1905 to 45,000,000, a loss of 19,000,000, or more than one-fourth of the total number of sheep in this country. A wool-tariff expert could devote an entire speech to the explanation of this slump in sheep production. He could attribute it in part to the demand for sheep as mutton and he could attribute it to a great many other things, but if he were a high protectionist and a Democratic tariff law was in operation or was even threatened, he would attribute it to that fact. And if a Democratic Congress had been elected in 1907, that fact would be charged with the fall in wool in 1908. With a Democratic tariff, either actual or prospective, every reverse in every industry is charged to it. With a Republican tariff act in operation, no reverse in any industry is charged to it. No wonder with such gross misrepresentation the American people cry, lo here, and lo there, and know not what the truth is.

THE WILSON BILL.

This brings me properly to a brief consideration of the Wilson bill. It is amazing how a fallacy can persist in the minds of the people if it only has behind it a great political party. The panic occurred in June, 1893, and the Wilson bill became a law in August, 1894, fully 14 months afterwards, and yet statesmen, leaders of the people, are heard to say that the Wilson bill was responsible for that era of hard times. During the Harrison administration I was raising corn on the prairies of Kansas, and we burned it for fuel because it was not worth hauling to town; corn selling at 9, 10, and 11 cents per bushel, and the more corn a farmer had the poorer he was; wheat selling down at 45 and 50 cents per bushel; hogs worth nothing; cattle worth nothing; the whole country during that administration, and owing to causes for which it was not responsible—and I will say that as a Democrat—working into the throes of universal industrial depression, finally culminating in the panic of 1893, a panic that was turned over full-fledged and ready to burst in all its fury by the Harrison administration to the administration of Cleveland, a condition which had progressed to the point that in February of 1893 a bond issue was determined upon and the bonds actually lithographed, whereupon the Republicans determined that it would be better to pass that situation on to the Cleveland administration.

Some day, when we are far enough removed in point of time, history will do justice to the panic of 1893, and when it does all that has been said in charging it up to the Wilson bill will read as the merest twaddle, if it is read at all. I read the other day the statement of the recent Republican candidate for governor of Texas with reference to free raw wool under the Wilson law, and he said with a fine sarcasm that we came within 4 cents a pound of having free raw cotton. Since the great bulk of our raw cotton has always been exported and its price fixed in the foreign markets, he seemed to overlook the fact that what he really succeeded in doing was to draw an indictment against the general industrial and financial conditions existing throughout the world and not against the Wilson bill. That cotton of all things produced in this country was worth nothing during that period of depression is to my mind the most convincing argument that the tariff act of 1894 was the victim rather than the cause of hard times. When I say this I say it not in defense of the wool rates in the Wilson bill, but in the interest of mere justice.

I do not recognize the doctrine of free raw material as the test of Democracy. It has been mentioned in but one national Democratic platform, that of 1892, in the whole century of the party's existence, and then only in the way of legislation "in the direction of free raw materials." If free raw material is a cardinal tenet of Democracy, it seems strange that it should be mentioned in but one of some 20 national platforms, and then only suggestively, when during all this time, beginning with 1816, we have had a tariff on raw wool, except during the three years of the Wilson law.

But it is not so singular, in view of the fact that the great Walker tariff, whose author is always quoted with approval by Democratic tariff reformers, carried a 30 per cent ad valorem duty upon raw wool. I wish this bill carried the same rate. I would not ask to go beyond the rate fixed by the author of the greatest Democratic tariff law ever enacted and what is conceded to have been the most successful. Ah, gentlemen say, that rate was fixed in the light of conditions then existing, and conditions are different now. How different? I have heard one of the greatest Democratic students of the tariff now living say that, in his opinion, the wool tariff was an actual benefit to the American farmer. In view of the actual competition to which he is subjected even now, it can only be a benefit because it saves him from even greater and sharper competition with the more cheaply produced wools of other parts of the world.

NO WOOL TRUST.

Mr. Chairman, there is no raw-wool trust. There is no combination in the production of wool. There are no millionaire sheep men. There may be millionaire lumbermen and millionaire cattle men and millionaire wheat men and millionaire cotton men, but I have never heard of any millionaire sheep men. It is very largely a small man's industry, a poor man's industry, and added to that, in this country, as shown by the following figures of the Agricultural Department, it is an almost universal industry. Nearly every State in the Union and nearly every county in every State has its flocks. According to these statistics for 1910, 32 of the 48 States and Territories each produced more than 1,000,000 pounds of raw wool. I give only the round numbers, as follows:

	Pounds raw wool.
Wyoming	36,000,000
Montana	33,600,000
New Mexico	19,200,000
Idaho	19,000,000
Ohio	16,900,000
Oregon	14,400,000
Utah	14,200,000
California	13,300,000
Michigan	11,475,000
Colorado	9,100,000
Texas	8,950,000
Pennsylvania	6,300,000
Wisconsin	6,075,000
Missouri	6,020,000
Nevada	5,950,000
Indiana	5,850,000
Iowa	5,400,000
Arizona	4,950,000
New York	4,950,000
Illinois	4,900,000
South Dakota	4,060,000
Washington	4,050,000
Kentucky	3,800,000
West Virginia	3,450,000
Minnesota	2,550,000
North Dakota	1,750,000
Virginia	1,640,000
Nebraska	1,625,000
Kansas	1,310,000
Maine	1,260,000
Tennessee	1,240,000
Vermont	1,170,000

It is an important industry in these 32 States and Territories, but, as I shall show by other figures, it is a leading industry in some of them. Agricultural Graphics show that for the period of 10 years, from 1899 to 1908, inclusive, the average of sheep in the United States was slightly over 52,000,000, of which approximately 25,000,000, or nearly one-half, were to be found in the Rocky Mountain division of States and Territories comprising Montana, Wyoming, New Mexico, Idaho, Utah, Colorado, Nevada, and Arizona.

I give them in their order, as follows:

	Number of sheep.
Montana	5,813,000
Wyoming	4,565,000
New Mexico	4,338,000
Idaho	3,440,000
Utah	2,842,000
Colorado	1,926,000
Nevada	1,101,000
Arizona	961,000
Total	24,986,000

Some idea of the importance of the sheep industry in many States may be gained from the following table, showing the number of sheep in proportion to population:

States.	Population.	Number of sheep.	Per capita.
Wyoming	146,000	4,565,000	31
Montana	376,000	5,813,000	15½
Nevada	82,000	1,101,000	13½
New Mexico	327,000	1,338,000	13
Idaho	325,000	3,440,000	10½
Utah	373,000	2,842,000	7½
Arizona	204,000	961,000	4½
Oregon	672,000	2,799,000	4
Colorado	799,000	1,926,000	2½
California	2,377,000	2,290,000	1

In order to emphasize the importance of the industry in the foregoing States, it may be of interest to note the relative unimportance of the industry in other States, to which, however, much attention has been given during the debates:

States.	Population.	Number of sheep.	Per capita.
Michigan	2,810,000	2,830,000	1
Ohio	4,767,000	3,125,000	⅔
Texas	3,896,000	1,891,000	½
Indiana	2,700,000	1,163,000	⅖
Pennsylvania	7,665,000	1,035,000	⅛
New York	9,113,000	1,151,000	⅛

And so on down the list.

My own State, Colorado, is tenth in the production of both sheep and wool in the United States and eighth in proportion to population. There are half as many sheep in the district I represent as there are in the entire State of Ohio. There are twice as many sheep in that district as in the entire State of Indiana. I doubt if there is a single Democratic Representative from the States of Ohio and Indiana who would say that in the framing of a tariff bill the sheep industry was not to be considered, or who would subscribe to that view, either publicly or privately, and its consideration must grow in the estimation of the Representative in proportion to its importance, and it should grow in proportion to its importance in the estimation of those who are not directly affected. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] furnished me with the following table, showing the rise and fall by decades of the sheep industry of this country by sections, beginning with 1840 and showing that with the exception of the mountain division of eight States and Territories it has reached its climax and declined:

Growth and decline of sheep industry in the United States since 1840.

1880	8,000,000

1900	18,000,000

The figures end with the year 1900, giving the Rocky Mountain States at that time but 18,000,000, whereas now, as I have shown, they number about 25,000,000; and the gentleman from Kansas goes on to say that if we are to have a shepherd race in this country it will probably be in the Rocky Mountains. But, Mr. Chairman, even these figures and this surmise as to the future, taking them to be true, are not sufficient to justify the conclusion that the industry is not worth sustaining, and surely no one will contend that the matter of locality should have anything whatever to do with the fixing of tariff rates. The whole country is interested in the sheep of the Rocky Mountain States as it is in the mills of the New England States. And all that the whole country can fairly ask of any section of the country is that it shall not be given a monopoly of its resources, so as to prosper at the expense of the remainder of the country. And my complaint against the proposed rate upon raw wool is that it is admitted to be below both a revenue and a competitive rate. It is admitted that the present tariff rates on raw wool are absolutely competitive, and that, notwithstanding this fact, these rates produce approximately one-third more revenue, or about $20,000,000 as against $13,000,000, than will be realized under the proposed rates, showing conclusively a substantial loss of revenue and also its reduction below the present competing point; although even here, in order to be perfectly fair, I will say that our failure to produce sufficient raw wool would lead to its importation in large quantities, even though the duty were higher than it is now.

But, Mr. Chairman, we may eliminate speculation and we may eliminate, to a large extent, the figures which seem to be capable of as variable conclusions as the theologian may read from his scriptural text, and we have left the substantial fact that we have here a great American industry which, during the 20-year period from 1891 to 1910, produced 5,899,520,518 pounds of raw wool as against 3,590,838,114 pounds imported, or nearly two-thirds of all the wool consumed in this country; one of the leading industries of a great section of the country and diffused among nearly all sections and among the producing class of people; that this industry is entirely worth preserving as a part of the national economy, an industry which it would be national folly to attempt to eliminate or to seriously injure, but which, under conditions as they now exist, can not produce as cheaply as in some other parts of the world. It being conceded that it is in part benefited and sustained by the tariff, and having been in part benefited and sustained by the tariff practically throughout the entire history of the industry in this country, so that we have no reliable criterion to guide us or to indicate with any degree of certainty the result of its transition to the free list, it will be the part of wisdom to go slowly, and, in the new order of things, to resolve the doubt in its favor by giving it a little more rather than a little less than half of the tariff rates it has been enjoying.

And, therefore, Mr. Chairman, while I believe that our Committee on Ways and Means have labored faithfully and honestly to bring about a solution of this most vexed question which will be fair to all interests involved, and while I would retire from public life before I would stultify myself through fear of consequences to me personally by bolting the party action under these conditions, I should feel entitled to reserve the right in the event the rate of duty upon raw wool should be increased elsewhere to 30 per cent ad valorem to vote to concur in that action.

REPUBLICAN PAPERS PREACHING CALAMITY.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have displeased some gentlemen on this side of the House by my attitude toward the rate of duty proposed upon raw wool in the pending bill, because I indicated that it ought to carry a somewhat higher rate. At home I have been denounced by Republican papers as a traitor to the interests of my State by agreeing to be bound by the caucus action on this bill. This bill, according to these Republican papers, is going to absolutely destroy woolgrowing in Colorado. The production of wool in Colorado owes nothing to nature; it owes nothing to the air and sunshine and water; it owes nothing to the natural herbage on the great mountain slopes and in the vast mountain parks; it owes nothing to the law of supply and demand; it owes nothing to the fact that the mills of this country will keep on weaving all the wool they can get and the men, women, and children of this country will keep on wearing that weave; it owes nothing to all these elements, but all is owing to a specific duty of 11 cents per pound on wool, the reduction of which to a 20 per cent ad valorem duty is to absolutely destroy the wool industry of that State.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that whether the action of the Democrats in Congress in leaving a duty on raw wool is consistent or otherwise, the attitude of the Republican press of my State is thoroughly consistent with the doctrine and teaching of the Republican Party. A duty of 25 cents per bushel on wheat has built up a great, splendid, triumphant civilization in Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and Minnesota; free wheat from Canada is about to restore the primeval waste whence sprang these great Commonwealths. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A specific duty of 11 cents per pound on wool gave that magnificent galaxy of mountain States to the Nation; now through the medium of a 20 per cent ad valorem duty on wool the mountain pines in all their primeval solitude will sigh a requiem over their desolate ruins. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The genius of the world's most imperial people and the world demand, growing by leaps and bounds and theatening to outrun supply, have nothing to do with the life of agriculture and of industry in this country; this life flows and ebbs with the ebb and flow of the tariff, and now with the tariff ebb they are to be swept out completely into the vortex of a common ruin.

Mr. Chairman, I despise the source of these dire but false prophecies and I am not disturbed by them, and I only want to observe here that giving ear to such echoes of its own teachings in the making of its last tariff bill brought the Republican Party into its present low estate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I want the Democratic Party, now in its hour of opportunity, to do its duty and to hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may, only asking that they be fair as well as firm. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If anything in the way of tariff legislation was an issue in the last campaign and was settled by that campaign, it was a substantial revision of Schedule K [applause on the Democratic side], characterized by a Republican President as indefensible, and which is shown by its own operation to be not only highly protective of the wool manufacturing industry in this country, but practically prohibitive of imports of manufactured wool. For the Democratic Party to fail under these conditions to undertake a substantial downward revision of this schedule would unquestionably and properly cost it the confidence of the people, and no Representative whose vision outruns the bounds of his own district, no man who is fit to represent the people, will ask that the cup which he must press to the lips of others shall pass wholly from him. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the history of this Democratic bill, H. R. 11019, began on June 1, so far as we have any knowledge, with a caucus of the Democratic Members of this House. That information came to us through a resolution presented to this House by the chairman of that caucus, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], on June 2, who asked for the privilege of inserting it in the RECORD. It is to be found on page 1683 of the RECORD, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy—

[Applause on the Republican side.]

But in view of the Democratic platform demand for a "gradual reduction" of the tariff, and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury—

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

a result of Republican extravagance—

a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

In that same RECORD, Mr. Chairman, on page 1684, appears the following:

And this was the document or the information on which this resolution was drawn, as to the "depleted and depleting condition of the Treasury," and was inserted at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to show that there was no "depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury."

On the opening of the debate in this House on June 7 the distinguished and able chairman of the Ways and Means Committee addressed the House. He called attention to this financial statement of the Public Treasury of the United States, a copy of which is inserted above, to further attempt to show a "depleted and depleting condition of the Treasury." But since the insertion of this report into the RECORD by the gentleman from New York, and by statements and addresses by Members on this side of the House, we have not heard anything further from the gentlemen on that side about the necessity of this bill because of a "depleted and depleting" Treasury. So that argument, which they attempted to make, of the "depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury" miserably failed as the reason for the 20 per cent ad valorem. The finances of the Government are to-day in most excellent condition. The United States Treasury will have a surplus of approximately $25,000,000 when the fiscal year of 1911 ends June 30. For 1910 the surplus was $15,000,000. The two years preceding that, to wit, 1909 and 1908, show deficits. The whole truth is it was done to pacify the Members from the woolgrowing States and to keep them in line for next year's election. They need those States to help elect a Democrat for President and a Democratic Congress next year. Therefore we come to the proposition, which, in my mind, is the real proposition in this bill, and that is that the Democratic Party are to-day, as they were under the administration of Cleveland, in favor of free raw wool. And from the statements of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and from this resolution presented by the chairman of the Democratic caucus, as well as from the addresses made upon this floor by members of that committee and of the majority of this House, it is well understood by the country that they are yet in favor of free raw wool and only await an opportunity to again saddle it upon the people.

So I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the question before this House—at least, it is the question before the American people, and a question that will have to be met by the Democratic Party in the next campaign—is one of whether or not the American people are in favor of free raw wool or in favor of protection as now provided under the law. And that question will have to be met. You gentlemen have made the issue, and you can not deny that that is your position before the country.

The sheep industry has had a hard enough struggle in America to be let alone. It was not until the beginning of the eighteenth century that any success was achieved in raising sheep in this country. The difficulties at first were the climate and the inability of the colonists to understand the proper methods to pursue and the care to take in raising sheep. Then the wolves came along and destroyed them. Another hindrance to sheep raising in this country followed rapidly along, and that was the British woolen manufacturers. They discouraged the sheep industry among the colonists because they wanted to sell to the colonists the woolens manufactured in England. Then the industry was again attacked, not by climate, because the colonists had learned to take care of the sheep; not by the wolves, because they had been killed off in places where sheep were herded, but by the dogs, and they destroyed many of the flocks. So, with the climate, the wolves, the dogs, and the British woolen manufacturers, the sheep industry did not for many years make much headway in America. It was a losing proposition financially. Some wealthy planters pursued the novelty, however, and at much expense brought some fine stock from Spain and other places, especially merinos, and finally there was some splendid flocks in this country. One of the early wealthy citizens to take an interest in sheep raising was George Washington Parke Custis, grandson of Martha Washington, at his Arlington estate. Custis took a great interest in the matter of sheep for stock breeding and domestic manufacture, and he saw in the advent of the merinos a promise of the opening in America of woolen-cloth making. At that time all the cloth of this character used in this country was imported from England, and could only be obtained at considerable cost.

The importance of the matter, because of the success of the manufacture of cotton cloth by the Southern States, was occupying then the thoughts of a number of public-spirited men. To foster improvements in sheep and to encourage woolen manufacture at home, Mr. Custis, in 1803, called a convention of those interested in sheep husbandry and wool manufacture. It met at Arlington House, and really marked the beginning of the woolen-manufacturing interests of the country. It is not known whether or not this convention recommended the imposition by Congress of a tariff on woolen goods, but from the views held at that time regarding and the actual needs of an infant industry, it is presumed it did. The convention also led to the adoption by Mr. Custis of a custom which rendered his fine estate and himself famous throughout the country. He entered into sheep raising with considerable ardor, and in succeeding years the annual sheepshearing at Arlington Spring brought together from all parts of the country an assemblage of men interested in the industry and others distinguished by their ability in public life. All were the guests of Mr. Custis, and the occasion became almost an annual festival.

The spring at which the gatherings took place was at the foot of a wooded slope, near the bank of the river, and not far from where stood the old Alexander mansion. It was a pure and copious fountain, gushing out from the roots of a huge and venerable oak tree, which doubtless stood there when the Indians of a former age came thither to slake their thirst. Around the spring a beautiful grassy lawn, shaded by a variety of trees, extended, affording a magnificent resort for such meetings. Mr. Custis always presided. Toasts were drunk, speeches were made, and prizes were awarded by Mr. Custis to the persons bringing, for purposes of exhibition, the finest specimens of sheep. Generally these ceremonies took place under the shelter of Washington's war tent, which was brought out for the occasion from among the treasured relics of the first President that Mr. Custis possessed. The host usually made a stirring address, and in one of his speeches delivered while wool manufacturers were yet unknown in America, he said prophetically:

> America shall be great and free and minister to her own wants by the employment of her own resources. The citizens of my country will proudly appear when clothed in the produce of their own native soil.

The efforts Mr. Custis was making in behalf of the sheep-raising industry attracted general attention, and among his letters of that time we find several from James Madison, then Secretary of State and afterwards President of the United States. In one of these Mr. Custis is informed that Mr. Madison—> offers for himself the thanks to which Mr. Custis is entitled from his fellow citizens for his laudable and encouraging efforts to increase and improve an animal which contributes a material so precious to the independent comfort and prosperity of our country. Mr. Madison wishes that Mr. Custis may be amply gratified in the success of his improving experiments, and that his patriotic example may find as many followers as it merits.

In another letter on the same subject Mr. Madison says:

> It gives me pleasure to find your attention to this interesting subject does not relax and that you are successfully inviting to it other public-spirited gentlemen.

In this matter, however, like in a good many others, Mr. Custis understood the theory of sheep raising and of arousing interest in the subject better than he did the practice. His own efforts met with very poor success. He established a large flock of Merinos on the hills of Arlington, but they were gradually killed off by thieves and dogs, until but two animals remained to show that Mr. Custis was still true to his principles. The absence of the sheep somewhat interfered with the successful continuation of the annual sheepshearing gatherings at the Custis Spring, and they were eventually abandoned. Mr. Custis retained his interest in sheep raising, however, and before his own flock became extinct he had the satisfaction of seeing the manufacture of American woolens grow into an important industry.

Beginning with the year 1708, weaving came to be a fixture in many of the homes of the colonists, and by 1719 there was scarcely a New Englander who was not "clad in his own manufacture." Woolen goods for the use of colonists, however, was mostly exported from England. Prior to the Revolutionary War exportations of woolen goods from England to the colonists was of considerable value to England, amounting to several million dollars a year. With the beginning of the Revolutionary War there was increased demand for domestic wool, which stimulated that industry, and for several years there was very little imported from England to this country. After the close of the war, however, importations of British woolens amounted to considerable, and for the years 1790 to 1794 the importations averaged again several million dollars' worth a year, and running as high for the years 1795 to 1799 as $10,000,000 a year. From 1800 to 1807 efforts were made to establish American woolen factories with modern machinery and power. The chief obstacle to their success, however, was the importations of woolens from abroad.

The tariff on woolens was small at this period and was of little benefit to the home industry until 1812, when the tariff was fixed at 35 per cent ad valorem. From 1808 to 1815 woolen manufacture, partially due to the increased raising of sheep, took on great impetus, and a great deal of the woolen goods used by Americans was manufactured at home. In 1810 there were 24 woolen mills in this country. A great hindrance to domestic manufacture at this time was the lack of proper quality of domestic wool. There was little profit in the manufacture of woolen goods at this time and up to 1828, because of competition from abroad. The tariff act of 1828 provided for a mixed duty of 4 cents a pound and 40 per cent, which was afterwards increased to 45 and 50 per cent, ad valorem. Importations still continued very large and amounted at this time (about 1830) to $11,819,000 a year. The number of sheep in this country during this period was about twelve or thirteen million.

From 1830 to 1840 was a period of great growth for the woolgrowing industry, because of protection of American wool. Improvements continued in the supply of wool and the manufacture thereof under protective tariffs until the passage of the tariff act of 1883, which somewhat retarded the industry. The McKinley tariff act of October 6, 1890, gave protection to the woolgrowers substantially as of 1867, under which act the flocks had so rapidly increased.

The prosperity of the woolgrowing industry was not to be let alone, however, for very long, and on August 1, 1894, the Wilson bill was enacted, which took off the protection to wool entirely. This caused almost the ruination of that great industry in this country because of the foreign competition. On July 24, 1897, the Dingley tariff became a law, which restored the duties on wool and revived the American sheep industry. This protection has continued substantially as of that date, and, under that law and the protection of to-day, as unchanged by the last tariff act of the Congress of the United States, has given to the wool industry the protection that it must have to be successful. These constant changes, however, in the tariff, as well as the threats of the Democratic Party to take that protection away, have kept this industry in turmoil.

Farmers and sheep raisers, remembering the last Democratic administration under President Cleveland and free wool, have hesitated to increase their flocks and develop this industry to its full capacity, as the following facts and figures show, to wit:

Number of farms reporting sheep and lambs, and number of sheep and lambs reported as on farms and ranges, by States and Territories—1910 and 1900.

[1] Includes for 1910 lambs born between January 1 and April 15; for 1900, lambs under 1 year old June 1.

[2] Includes Indian Territory for 1900.

Owing to the different date of enumeration in 1900 and 1910, the numbers of lambs are not comparable for the two periods, and the only figures that are comparable are the aggregates of ewes, rams, and wethers, and those that are unclassified by ages or sex. The supplemental tabulation not completed will add about 100,000 to the aggregate of the ewes, rams, and wethers. Taken as a whole, the figures indicate a marked falling off in the number of farms having sheep. The number of those farms has decreased in 10 years from 763,518 to 608,363; a decrease of substantially 20 per cent. This decrease in the number of farms keeping sheep is not accompanied by any corresponding decrease in the number of sheep, the number of wool-bearing sheep being substantially the same in 1910 as in 1900. The increase in the average flock offsets the decrease in the number of farms keeping sheep.

The total number of wool-producing sheep on farms and ranges in 1900 was 39,852,967; the number shown in the tabulation for 1910 is 39,470,312. Later tabulation will doubtless increase this number to 39,570,000, which differs from the figures of 1900 by less than 1 per cent.

The number of wool-bearing sheep in barns and inclosures, not on farms, in 1900 was 179,600. The tabulation so far completed indicates a probable number of the same class in 1910 of 255,600. Allowing this number, and further allowing an average weight of fleece of 7.4 pounds, the average indicated by tabulations thus far made, it is probable that the final report of the census will indicate a wool clip in the United States of sheep on farms and not on farms of 40,000,000 fleeces of an aggregate weight of 296,000,000 pounds, as compared with a wool clip in 1900 of 276,992,000 pounds.

The enumerators of 1900 reported an average value for the wool clip of that year of a little more than 17 cents per pound, or an aggregate value of $45,723,739. The tabulation so far completed indicates an average value of 24 cents a pound. If this average is realized for all the wool on the farms of the country, the wool clip of 1910 would have a value of approximately $71,000,000, or over 50 per cent greater than 10 years ago.

My great and prosperous State, Missouri, which has shaken off the shackles of Democracy, and for the last dozen years stood for advancement and protection to her industries, has gone forward also as a woolgrowing and sheep-raising State, as the table below indicates. I call your special attention to the figures regarding Missouri.

Missouri's annual production of wool to-day amounts to 8,245,000 pounds, with a valuation of $1,978,800. Should even this bill become a law, this industry would be almost ruined in that State. Free wool would be complete destruction.

The following letter from one of the largest woolen importers, located at St. Louis, gives an unprejudiced opinion of this bill. He writes as follows:

ST. LOUIS, June 12, 1911.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of June 9, as distributors as well as importers of woolens, we naturally favor a lower tariff on woolens. The proposed bill H. R. 11019, however, would, in our judgment, be destructive to the woolen-manufacturing interests in this country as well as impair the quality of woolens offered for consumption. If there was any possible chance of the bill becoming a law, everybody, from the sheep raiser to the last man manufacturing or distributing woolens, would oppose the bill, as it can only be beneficial to foreign manufacturers.

The price of woolen goods in this country now is not based upon what goods cost to import under the present tariff. In fact, more goods can be produced in the United States than can be consumed; therefore, the competition is between home manufacturers and the values not much higher than they are on the other side. From observation, I believe a better suit of clothes can be purchased in this country for $15 than can be bought in England for £3. The reason of this is not because the goods and making of garments cost less, but on account of the competition among the retail and wholesale dealers in clothing.

An ad valorem duty on woolens would not keep out fraudulent invoices, and the omission of a weight duty would promote the importation of low-class, heavy-weight goods, upon which the ad valorem duty would be small. We went through an experience similar under the Wilson bill, which was very disastrous to the woolen-manufacturing as well as the sheep interests.

Please understand we are not manufacturers, only distributors; hence you can rely upon the statements herein made being impartial.

Yours, truly,

JOS. M. HAYES WOOLEN CO.
JOS. M. HAYES.

Mr. Chairman, 47,701 sheep were received in the markets of St. Louis last week. What does that mean? It means, to my mind, that already the unrest and the threats of free wool have reached the farmers of that State and of that section of the country, and they are beginning already to deplete their flocks because of this, as they believe, impending danger.

The Democratic majority of this House should realize and understand that they are striking, in my judgment, a death blow to one of the great industries of that imperial State. There are 44,000 and more farmers in that State whose livelihood is in great part maintained by the raising of sheep and lambs and the production of wool. These farmers, by raising this wool and these sheep, are doing it not only for their own benefit and for the purpose of making a livelihood, but they are also helping to supply the American manufacturers with wool for the making of woolen clothes and woolen goods, thereby enabling Americans to wear homemade clothes, as well as to give employment to nearly 200,000 American workers engaged in that industry.

Mr. Chairman, Missouri is in favor, not of this policy, indicated in this bill, but she is in favor of that policy of protection that the Republican Party has fostered—protection to American industries, the farm industries, the home industries, the wool industry, and the sheep industry—and ever since Missouri has been a protection State she has progressed in all things, material and otherwise. I can not begin to tell of all the advances she has made since she enlisted under the Republican banner of protection and advancement; but let me for a minute call your attention to one or two things in her principal city, which show how she has progressed under Republican policies and under the laws of protection which that party has caused to be placed upon the statute books. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The business of St. Louis has doubled in the last 10 years. The St. Louis bank clearings for 1900 were $1,688,849,494. In 10 years that amount has nearly trebled. The St. Louis bank clearings for 1910 were $3,727,949,379.

In 1900 the tonnage of St. Louis was 25,313,330 tons. In 1910 the tonnage had increased to nearly 52,000,000.

The post office cash receipts of St. Louis in 1900 were $2,031,664. In 1910 they were $4,539,185.

In 1900 the value of the factory product of St. Louis was $193,783,000. In 1910 it had increased to $327,676,000; and this, Mr. Chairman, under the policies of protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And I might say to my colleagues from that great State, that they will have a splendid opportunity in the next campaign to tell the farmers of that State about the great benefits that will accrue to them by having free wool.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with these historical and undisputed facts before us, and recalling the prosperity of the sheep industry under the tariff act of 1867, under which the number of sheep increased to about 50,000,000; then the reduction of duties on wool and woolen goods in 1883, causing the number of sheep to decrease over 7,000,000; then the Republican tariff act of 1890 improving the conditions, and then in 1893 the sheep had increased to 47,000,000; then (1894) the Wilson bill, placing wool on the free list, reducing the number of sheep over 11,000,000 in four years; then the Dingley Act, giving protection as now, and the flocks increasing to their present number of about 51,000,000, with an annual wool clip of 321,000,000 pounds, and, after detailing the hardships and difficulties of the farmers of this country to establish and to make profitable the woolgrowing business, we are now met with another effort by the Democratic Party, which, in my judgment, will destroy and annihilate this splendid American industry. In the words of the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], this bill proposes to substitute for the specific and ad valorem duties on wool and woolen goods in the Payne Tariff Act a system of ad valorem duties exclusively. In lieu of the present specific duty of 11 cents per pound on wool of class 1, to wit, fine wools, such as constitute about 75 per cent of the wools grown in the United States, and practically all the wool of the intermountain States; 12 cents a pound on wool of class 2, being long-fibered combing, such as Cotswold and Lincolnshire; and 3 to 7 cents a pound on coarse wool and hair, they propose an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent of the foreign price on wools of all classes.

The specific duties of 11, 12, 3, and 7 cents per pound on wool contained in the Payne tariff were equivalent in 1910, on the basis of the valuations given by importers on the importations of that year, to 47.60 per cent for class 1, 46.54 per cent for class 2 wools, both of which compete directly with domestic wools, and 38.79 per cent for class 3 wools, or an average of 44.31 per cent. So that, assuming that the values were correct and that the protection is in proportion to the ad valorem equivalent of the duties levied, the present bill reduces the duty, and hence the protection, on wools considerably more than half. The reduction on wools partly manufactured is still greater, so that the amount of protection afforded the American woolgrower under the present bill, assuming, for the sake of argument, that an ad valorem duty on wool can be collected without serious undervaluations, probably amounts to about one-third of the protection under the present law.

To get at the true situation, however, and as to the position of the Democratic Party upon the wool industry, we must go beyond this bill, because, as heretofore stated, it has been admitted by Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee upon the floor of this House that this duty is put upon wool for the simple purpose of bringing in some revenue and not with the idea of protecting the wool industry from the foreign importations, and that as soon as possible they would take that duty off and we will have free wool, as we did under the Wilson Act during the administration of President Cleveland. During the debate upon this bill in this Chamber on June 9, and when the distinguished Member from Massachusetts of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PETERS] was addressing the House, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], also a member of the Democratic Party, asked of the gentleman from Massachusetts the following question:

> Why is it that since the Wilson Act went out and the Dingley Act came in there has been a constantly growing increase in the price of wool as well as in the production of wool?

The RECORD will show that no satisfactory answer was given to this question. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] further in that debate stated that he believed that every pound of wool that is brought in here from abroad tends to decrease the price of wool here, because every pound of wool that is brought into this country will displace a pound of wool grown in this country, and, further, that under this bill the American woolgrower could not compete with a foreign grower of wool. These statements are from a Member of this House, a Democrat, who is from a woolgrowing State, and he knows something about the conditions, and what he speaks is the truth, which in substance is that if this bill should become a law the woolgrowing industry in America would be ruined.

They admit that the duty is lowered upon wool so as to encourage importations from other countries, which means of course that every pound of wool imported into this country from foreign countries displaces American-grown wool and will compel the woolgrowers in this country to sell their wool at about half to a third of what they now receive. Statistics and experience already show that American woolgrowers can not do this, and therefore the result would be that the sheep industry in this country would be ruined, and the 44,000 and more farmers in my State who raise sheep and produce wool, as well as the 608,000 and more farmers in the United States, would have to give up the business of sheep raising and the growing of wool because of no home market. The present duty of 11 cents a pound is as low as we can possibly put it and give the wool industry in this country an opporunity to exist, for let me call your attention to the fact that last year with this present tariff duty of 11 cents a pound on wool there was imported into this counry 250,000,000 pounds of wool in the grease, which is almost one-half of the wool consumed in this country. If foreigners could import almost one-half of the wool used in this country last year with the present tariff of 11 cents, what could they be able to do with this tariff reduced to about 4 cents, as it is admitted it would be under this proposed Democratic bill. The answer is plain. They would import practically all of it. It is claimed by the framers of this bill that the importations of wool would increase if this bill should be enacted into a law. This means also that this increase importation will lower the price of wool raised in this country. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

PETERS], Democratic member of the Committee on Ways and Means, said in this House on June 9:

It is expected the price of raw wool will be lower, if this bill passes, than if the present duty of 11 cents a pound should remain on it.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not go into a detailed discussion of this bill as it relates to manufactures of wool, preferring to wait until the next regular session of this Congress in December, when we will have the best possible information gathered for our information and action. I refer to the Tariff Board, created by the last Congress of the United States, and which was given authority and the means for making a complete study, examination, and report on the woolen schedule. This Tariff Board is composed of experts of both political parties and their report will be based upon the best possible information, data, and figures concerning the growth of wool and the manufacture of woolen articles.

Gentlemen of this House who are advocating this present bill voted to create this Tariff Board for the purpose of getting the best possible information, and reporting it to Congress, concerning Schedule K, the woolen schedule; but now they have grown so wise, because of victory at the polls in the last election, that they think they are well able to legislate upon this most important schedule without further information. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote to suspend action upon this bill till next December, when we will have this additional, important, and nonpartisan but scientific information, upon which we can then act with intelligence. I do not know whether this schedule is perfect, but I do know that if this bill is enacted into law it would make this portion of the tariff laws much more imperfect and cause wide disaster to wool and to the woolen manufacturing industries; and if this schedule is not perfect, then the only way we can make it perfect is by having this reliable information from the Tariff Board to enable us to intelligently change it. I thoroughly believe in a protective tariff, which will enable our manufacturers to pay American wages to American workmen. There was received by this Government as customs receipts for the last fiscal year the amount of $41,900,692 on imports of wool and manufactures of wool. When foreign countries can ship into this country wool and woolen products, on which they pay a tariff of that amount, it does not appear to me that the manufacturers and sheep growers of this country have any exorbitant protection. Is it not much better that this country should raise the sheep to furnish the wool for the manufacture of these goods, so that the manufacturers can make these goods here in America by the employment of American capital and American labor, instead of buying these goods from foreign manufacturers, made out of foreign-grown wool and manufactured with foreign labor? The American wage scale and standard of living are much different than in any foreign country. Everybody admits that the wages paid American workmen are higher than in any other country, and the only way the continued employment for American workmen can be had in this country is to give sufficient protection to our industries to make up for the difference in the goods manufactured in foreign countries with cheap labor and goods manufactured in this country with decent wage paid labor.

Mr. W. C. Jager, of St. Louis, an expert on wool and the woolen industry, writes me under date of June 12 to this effect: That the enactment of this bill into law would cause many mills to shut down, especially those in the Central West, as they would have extra expense in getting any foreign raw stock over the far eastern manufacturers. Besides, he says, the foreign manufacturers would swamp this country with their goods for the reason it does not give to our manufacturers protection sufficient to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad. After 24 years of business in this industry, says Mr. Jager, and knowing of the effects of the Wilson bill with free wool and the great disaster that followed its enactment into law, I should think the lesson should have been so well learned that no effort would be made again to repeat that experience, but protection would be given to our western mills so that they would have a chance at business. The western mills need this protection even more than do the New England mills. This gentleman's opinion of this bill and its effect upon the woolen industry is practically the same as that of all others in that section of the country who understand and know the truth about it.

To show the relative cost of the production of woolen goods at home and abroad and for the necessity of maintaining our standard of wages and living in this country, as opposed to that in the foreign countries, I call your attention to the following tables, prepared by Mr. Julius Forstmann, president of the Forstmann & Huffmann Co., located at Passaic, N. J. Mr. Forstmann is an expert on these matters and was formerly a member of the German Tariff Commission, and from my examination of the statistics and facts covered in these tables I am able to vouch for their substantial accuracy.

[1] Preliminary figures issued by Census Bureau.

Increase in value of products 1904-1909 was greater than in any 10 years prior to 1900.

From these figures and facts it would appear that every thinking man would want to learn all possible about the woolen industry and await the report of the Tariff Board in December next before passing judgment upon the changes needed in this schedule. Mr. William W. Wood, a large manufacturer of woolen goods, in an address delivered before the National Association of Wool Manufacturers at Washington on February 1, 1911, said, in part, as follows:

Surely Schedule K ought to be regarded favorably by the American people. It protects the labor of the employees in the woolen industry; it contributes largely to the revenues of the country—its proper share—and it admits foreign manufactures of wool. What more could be hoped for?

Are these manufacturers so protected that they become creatures of inordinate wealth? You can count upon the fingers of one hand the wealthy woolen manufacturers of America. I know of no one in the woolen business who has retired because of wealth. The margins of profit are so close in this business that the conduct of the business might be compared with farming in New England as against that in the West. A successful farmer in New England must make his living right from the rocky, sterile soil with his knuckles, whereas the great fertile West produces abundantly and easily. The woolen manufacturer's competition at home is so great and the risks of the business are so great that his margin is as that of the New England farmer.

A suit of clothes bought for the President of the United States yields a profit to the man who made the cloth of not over 38 cents on that suit, and these figures have been challenged by manufacturers from Pennsylvania, who have stated to me that their profit was less than half of that. I have seen overcoats made from the cloth of my own mills, overcoats for boys, on which the net profit to us was less than 9 cents. I merely mention these figures to show you how closely fought the woolen manufacturing business is, and that the high price of clothing is not due to the tariff, nor yet to the manufacturer, but to the middle man, whose expenses are very great, and to the retailer, who also has large expenses to meet in the way of rentals and much advertising in the newspapers of the country. If the newspapers appreciated that feature, I doubt if they would raise a single letter against Schedule K.

After all, should we not give some attention to the retailer and find out what he pays the manufacturer for the woolen goods and what he sells them to the consumers for? I think we will find that that is where a great part of our money for woolen goods goes, and that we will find the facts to be similar to a Chicago man who paid $4 for a barrel of apples, and found tucked away among the apples the following note signed and addressed:

DEAR CONSUMER: I received 75 cents for this barrel of apples. Will you kindly let me know what you paid for them?

I take the following from the RECORD of the Sixty-first Congree, of date March 4, 1911, as bearing further on this point:

Mr. GAINES said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Gaines] is recognized.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I have several times called the attention of the House to the fact that there is in this country no relation between the prices received by the original producers of articles and the prices which are paid by the purchasers—retail purchasers.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the leader of the minority, is not present in the Chamber at this time. I have on my desk a piece of blue serge sufficient to make a suit of the kind which usually costs the ultimate consumer from $40 to $60. I desire to present it to the leader of the minority [Mr. CLARK of Missouri], with the request—not upon any condition, but with the request—that he wear it while making some of his free-trade speeches. [Laughter and applause.]

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to read two letters which I have received in connection with this piece of cloth and the receipted bill for it.

BRISTOL, PA., February 28, 1911.

Hon. JOSEPH H. GAINES,
The House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR Mr. GAINES: The American Woolen Co. advises me by telephone that they have sent you from their New York offices 3¼ yards of standard serge, at $1.28¼ per yard. This is the net mill price they receive for these goods. The weight per yard is 16 ounces. Receipted bill for this merchandise accompanies invoice.

I have taken up with them also the average price of this weight and quality of serge in the years 1905, 1906, and 1907, and they tell me the price was $1.35 on the same basis of figuring as $1.28¼ to-day; so you see that these goods are selling lower than during the three latter years of the Dingley bill period.

Very truly, yours,

JOSEPH R. GRUNDY,
Per H. M. C.

Then I have the following letter from the American Woolen Co.:

AMERICAN WOOLEN CO.,

Hon. JOSEPH H. GAINES,

DEAR SIR: Following instructions given us by Mr. Joseph R. Grundy, I beg to say that we are forwarding to you to-day by Adams Express, charges prepaid, 3¼ yards of our 16-ounce serge made from half-blood stock, which we have billed at $1.28¼ per yard, the net price at which we are selling these goods to-day to the wholesale trade of the United States.

I beg also to send herewith receipted bills covering this purchase, which I understand was at your request.

Yours, very truly,

FRANCIS R. MASTERS,
Associate Selling Agent.

J. CLIFFORD WOODHULL, Agent,
Per C. P. LINDBLUM, Cashier.

I wish to make merely a few comments upon these facts: I repeat that the kind of woolen goods that the manufacturers of the country are receiving $1.28¼ for is the kind that enters into a suit of clothes for which the retail purchaser pays from $40 to $60, depending upon the reputation of the tailor.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GAINES. I will yield to the gentleman in due time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly called the attention of this House and endeavored, although ineffectually, to challenge the attention of the American people to the fact that the prices paid by retail purchasers throughout the country are in no case received by the protected manufacturers of the country. And that statement is true not alone with respect to the goods covered by Schedule K, the woolen schedule in the tariff law, but also with respect to agricultural products as well.

I shall content myself with one fact illustrating the truth of the latter fact. Directly beneath me, in the restaurant of this building, one may buy a Grimes's Golden apple from West Virginia, which, in my judgment, is the best apple grown in America—grown within 50 miles of this city, in Berkeley County. He must pay 5 cents for it; but the farmers of Berkeley County do not average 1 cent apiece for those apples. So that when we consider the relation between producers' price and retail price of commodities, whether farm products or manufactured articles, we find that the final price is always from 5 to 10 or even more times greater than the original price received by the producer.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES. Yes. Now I will yield and answer any question propounded by the gentleman.

Mr. FORNES. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the serge which he presents here from the American Woolen Manufacturing Co. sells at $1.28 a yard? Is that correct?

Mr. GAINES. One dollar and twenty-eight and a quarter cents is received by the mill.

Mr. FORNES. And does the gentleman say that the merchant tailors ask their customers, for making up that serge, anywhere from $40 to $50?

Mr. GAINES. From $40 to $60, depending upon the reputation of the tailor and where one makes the purchase.

Mr. FORNES. Is it not a fact, though, that the merchant tailors, as a rule, do not ask more than $25 for that price serge when made up into a suit?

Mr. GAINES. It is not a fact. The truth is that this sort of a suit would cost more than $25 at the ready-made clothing stores.

Mr. FORNES. I beg to differ with the gentleman on that point. Furthermore, is it not a fact that the same class of serge in 1905 sold at $1.10 net?

Mr. GAINES. I have just read the gentleman the information which shows that the price then was higher than now; that in 1905, 1906, and 1907 it was $1.35 a yard.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORNES. Is it not a fact——

Mr. GAINES. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. Has the gentleman any information as to what the foreign price would be?

I ask purely for information. Has the gentleman any information as to what the foreign price for that same article would be?

Mr. GAINES. I have no information as to what the foreign price for this article is. My point is that the high prices paid by retail purchasers of the country do not in any case bear any relation to the prices received by the original producer, either the protected or the unprotected producer, in this country. The producers of manufactured articles and the farm producers do not receive the high prices paid at retail in this country. And the truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the way to get relief for the ultimate consumers of this country is not to strike at the very small prices received by the producers, but to encourage the producers of America until there shall be a sufficient supply in the markets of the United States to reduce the price to the ultimate consumer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So, Mr. Chairman, there are evidently other things than the tariff that contribute to the high cost of living.

Mr. Chairman, over 90,000,000 American people are interested in wool and the woolen schedule. The welfare of many thousands is affected by the adjustment of that schedule. Millions of dollars are involved in the woolen industry from the raising of the sheep to the placing of the wool upon the backs and in the homes of the American people. The present schedule and rates have been substantially in existence since the Dingley Act of 1897, and, while there appears to be some needed changes in this schedule, we can well afford to wait until we have the complete report of the Tariff Board, created by the last Congress, before taking action. The time is not far off and we ought to settle this schedule on a scientific and economic basis and thereby give stability and peace for years to come to this great American industry, and not let politics, political supremacy, and ambition for public office, sway our minds and judgments against the honest and fair discharge of our duties as public servants of 93,000,000 American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, it has been with a great deal of pleasure during this debate that we have listened to the great solicitude expressed by the membership of the Republican Party in this House for that great commoner in the Democratic Party, William J. Bryan. Let me say to our Republican friends that whenever and wherever the Democratic Party gathers around the council table for conference his seat will be in the future, as it has been in the past, at the head of the table. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has not only converted to his policies seven and one-half million Democrats who follow him as their idol, but from the tone of this debate it seems that he has converted the leaders of the Republican Party as well. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was somewhat surprised to-day at the speech of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], late chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. It is true that he expressed his sentiments in language a little more emphatic than parliamentary, but we must remember that in the great solitude which surrounded him he was the only Republican, the only Member on that side of this Chamber, who dared to defend the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill throughout this entire debate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was also somewhat surprised at the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] yesterday, who came to the defense of the Woolen Trust, as he did to the defense of the Boot and Shoe Trust two or three weeks ago.

I want to call your attention for a moment to what he said, and if there is any man upon that side of the House who doubts there is a Woolen Trust which ought to be dealt with by legislation on this floor, I should like him to take the time after I am through to make his defense. The gentleman from Massachusetts said this:

> The amount of capital in the year 1909 invested in the woolen and worsted manufacturing industry was $419,000,000. The capital at that time of the American Woolen Co. consisted of $35,000,000 of preferred stock and $29,000,000 of common stock. When the company was organized there was issued $20,000,000 of preferred stock and $29,000,000 of common stock. It was the customary method of organizing corporations of that kind 10 years ago. The estimated value of the plants was submitted to the auditors and a report was made as to the condition of those plants and their value. It was estimated at that time that the plants and machinery and real estate and other things that went to make up the property of that company had a value of $25,000,000.

Ten years ago worth $25,000,000, and with that amount of property it capitalized for $49,000,000; $20,000,000 of which was preferred stock and $29,000,000 was common stock, the latter of which, we are informed by the gentleman, was sold at from 25 to 35 cents on the dollar. That such stock never had paid a dividend and was never intended to pay one. For one, I attack such business methods as unjust and unfair to the general public. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

How much influence this organization had on the entire industry of the country, and what influence it had in fixing the price on all the production of the country is a matter to be considered in determining the ethics of the transaction.

When he made his defense I said to him, and I repeat it now, that if that is the kind of finance you justify, the difference between you and myself is that you justify it and I condemn it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, why, I ask, should any corporation, trust, or other organization be permitted to sell stock which is never to be remunerative and, when sold, never intended to be? And how such conduct can be defended as legitimate is something I can not understand. It is indefensible. It is one of the many creations of high finance which has been exploiting the unsuspecting public and making a golden reward by plundering the frugality of an innocent people. It was capitalized at the beginning, according to the distinguished gentleman's statement, for $24,000,000 more than the estimated value of its property. It played both ends against the middle by first selling $24,000,000 worth of capital stock more than the estimated value of its property at a net profit; and, second, it was enabled to sell its product under the protective tariff at a larger price than it otherwise could have done. How, under such methods of financiering, could anyone be surprised at its rapid and sudden rise in wealth? It turned nothing into wealth, and on inflated values derived fabulous incomes. It has from the day of its organization controlled the woolen and worsted industry, and now in 10 years the value of the property invested in those lines of industry amounts to $419,000,000. This is an evidence, when properly managed, of what the tariff, the trusts, and high financiering can do, and the poor consumer and the unsuspecting investor must foot the bill. Is not this indefensible? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Such methods of dealing with the innocent public deserve censure, and should be prohibited by proper legislation, strictly enforced, to the end that integrity in business affairs may be upheld and confidence maintained. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was much astonished at the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] who has just preceded me, who has prophesied all kinds of disaster, if this bill passes, to the sheep and woolen industry in this country. In the light of past experiences he surely has no foundation for his prophetic visions. I ask him if conditions could possibly be worse, be more disastrous, in the sheep and wool industries than they have been under the McKinley, Dingley, and Payne tariff laws, the highest ever known in the history of tariff legislation? It has suffered more and witnessed harder times than it ever did under any other, as the statistics of the trade conclusively show. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is well sometimes to consult statistics in order that facts may be correctly stated. From the statistics furnished by the Commerce and Labor Department of this Government, we had in 1910, in round numbers, 7,000,000 less sheep in this country than we had in 1904. For six years the number dwindled at the rate of more than a million a year, and during all this time the Dingley bill was in force with the highest tariff on wool the country ever had. If a high tariff encourages this industry, as gentlemen insist, upon what hypothesis do they explain the existing conditions, as the facts show them to be? The truth is they can furnish no explanation consistent with the position they take. The two are irreconcilable. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What is true of the sheep industry is also true of the price of wool. The Wilson bill which put wool on the free list was not passed until August 24, 1894, and the woolen schedule did not take effect until January, 1895, and yet, in 1893, when the tariff on wool was the highest ever known up to the time of the passage of the Dingley law in 1897, wool was the lowest it had ever been known in the last 40 years. It sold that year for 14 cents a pound, and again under the Dingley law a still higher tariff on wool, the producer in 1908 sold it for 13 cents a pound, the lowest ever known. I challenge any Republican on this floor to show during the existence of the Wilson bill, from 1895 to 1897, while wool was on the free list, a time when wool sold as low as it has under the McKinley and Dingley tariff laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He will search the market reports in vain for a single instance.

By the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], I hold in my hand a letter from R. A. Beatty, of Huron County, Ohio, in which he states, as a wool producer, that he sold his wool in 1893 for 14 cents a pound, and three years ago, in 1908, he sold it for 13 cents a pound. He erroneously states, however, it was on the free list in 1893. It was then sold under the high-tariff duties of the McKinley law. It never while on the free list sold for such low figures as these. He, an Ohio farmer, fears no lower prices than these, he says, if it is free of all duty; and further says, if a tariff would increase the price of raw wool to the farmer, he loses it all, and more, too, on the increased price of clothing. And so he does. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—the minority leader—at the beginning of this debate turned to the Democratic Members and said, in a dramatic manner, "Are you going to tax men's clothing, women's dresses, and children's hats?" By such a question addressed to us I am unable to understand what he means. An answer sufficient to him is: The extravagance of his party during its 16 years of power has made it necessary for us to meet the public expenditures under his party's appropriations; that we tax these articles of necessity, as much as we regret to do so. The two billion-dollar Congresses under the administration of the Republican Party, which exploited the public Treasury and depleted its revenues by unnecessary expenditures, makes such a course unavoidable. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But let me say further in reply, we are going to reduce the tax on all these articles more than one-half what his party two years ago fixed it; and I want to know if he has enough concern in their welfare to vote with us on the adoption of this measure? If he is as much interested as he professes, he should vote accordingly, and show his interest by his actions as well as by his words. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again our answer to him is in behalf of these people; we are going to reduce the tax his party fixed on their wearing apparel so they will understand the Democratic Party legislates in their interest and the Republican Party against it; we are going to reduce the tax on cloth, out of which the poor man's clothing is made, from 160 per cent to from 25 to 40 per cent; on women's dress goods from 150 per cent to from 30 to 45 per cent; on blankets from 160 per cent to 30 per cent. We are going to reduce the tax on all the woolen schedule—the odious Schedule K, the schedule denounced by President Taft as indefensible—from 90 per cent to 42 per cent. We are going to revise it downward and keep our promise to the people and not violate it as did the Republican Party when it passed the Payne bill. Will the gentleman from Illinois assist in this humanitarian work or will he continue his tactics of obstruction? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We say to him that for 14 years his party has been, at the behest of the Woolen Trust, taxing cloth at from 80 to 160 per cent, women's dress goods at from 78 to 150 per cent, blankets at from 85 to 166 per cent, flannels from 90 to 150 per cent, and that he then exhibits the courage to ask of us such a question is beyond our comprehension. During this time he has seen the farmers' wool go down in price, the cost of his clothing go up, and the quality of his goods yearly get poorer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me ask, Are the Republicans in this standing with the President for a revision of this schedule downward—he has said it is indefensible—or are they against him? The people would like to know. What is the answer? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Again, others in this debate have asserted with an air of confidence that the present high tariff duties should be maintained in order to enable the operators to pay the high wages now paid employees in these industries, and then ask, Are you going to reduce the American wage earner in these industries to the level of the foreign employee? I answer that that has already been done, and we are striving to raise it to higher levels. Let us see what the facts are on this important matter and expose the fallacy of the Republicans on this subject.

In the woolen and worsted industry William Whitman, one of the greatest manufacturers of this line, recently testified that the American male weavers received 21 cents an hour, or for a day of 10 hours $2.10, or $12.60 per week; spinners, 12 cents an hour, or $1.20 per day, or $7.20 per week; dyers get $9 per week; loom fixers, $15 per week; combers, $7.20 per week; card strippers, $7.80 per week; and burlers, $6.60 per week. Are these the princely wages for which the Republicans levied an average duty of 90 per cent for owners of the woolen industry to pay their employees? How do these look under the conditions of the high cost of living brought under the rule of the Republican Party to a man who has a family to support and educate? And yet the high tariff, according to the Republican position, is levied solely for the benefit of the laboring man's wages. How they can have the audacity to make such a claim in view of the facts is beyond the comprehension of any reasonable mind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What do foreign wage earners receive in this line of industry? In Bulletin No. 86, of date January 10, 1910, issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor, we find our department gives the following facts, which is a complete answer on the subject: Workshop wage earners in dress goods in England average $12.39 a week; shirt makers, $7.26 a week; ready-made clothing, $8.15 per week; boots and shoes, $6.98 per week; silk goods, $8.33 per week; straw goods, $8.90 per week; dyeing, $7.18; 26 per cent of those engaged in making clothing made $14.60 per week; 28 per cent made from $12.17 to $14.60 per week; 15 per cent from $9.73 to $12.17 per week. From these incontestable figures it clearly appears that the English laborer is fully as well, if not better, paid than our American laborer. England in this branch of industry is our greatest and most formidable competitor. In view of these facts, does the manufacturer in this country need a high tariff to enable him in this industry to compete with his foreign competitor? Who would dare say he does?

Now, in these comparisons we have not taken into account the efficiency of our labor, which produces almost three times as much daily as the foreign labor, and yet receives just about the same wages. No distinction is made in price and no reward is given for its great superiority in this respect. The truth is we can and do produce more in the same length of time and for less than any other country in the world. Labor knows it and labor can not be flimflammed longer on the levy of the tariff for its benefit. Labor in this country has never been benefited by protection, but the American manufacturers have grown rich under it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the other day the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] inquired, "Are you going to place our high-priced labor on a par with the labor of free-trade England and shut down our industries and turn our high-priced labor out of employment?" A sufficient answer to that question is to reply that England is not a free-trade country; it is a tariff for revenue only, and it levies its tariff on noncompetitive articles, while our country levies its tariff on competitive articles, and the difference is it can change its tariff policy without interrupting business for this reason, while we can not. This marks the distinction. Again, let me say to him, as a further answer to that part of his inquiry about shutting down the industries and turning high-paid labor out of employment, it is a stereotyped expression coined for the specific use of high-protection advocates in every country in the world. In the recent election for the House of Commons in England, the paramount issue was the tariff question, and the advocates of high protection advocated a change in their tariff policy, and as a reason gave that is was necessary in order to prevent the cheap-labor-made products of the United States of America from being imported and shutting down their industries and turning their high-paid labor out of employment. This argument is used everywhere by the advocates of a tariff for protection, as a means to sustain a system, that its beneficiaries may plunder and extort from the consumers unearned profits, and multiply predatory wealth. It has served its time, its unrighteous purpose; and intelligent people, whether in this or any other country, will soon expose its fallacy and repudiate its hypocrisy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the advocates of a tariff for protection's sake have most earnestly asserted on this floor the proposition that without a protective tariff our manufacturing industries, because of the difference between the wages here and abroad, can not compete with foreign manufacturers and will shut down our industries and turn our labor out of employment because of the importation of foreign-made products. This contention, if it be true, presents a serious proposition, and one demanding serious consideration. To all who assert such a doctrine I deny its truth, and assert the facts show there is no foundation for such a charge. On the contrary, I affirm there is no danger of such a result and that the statistics abundantly sustain my position. We are now competing abroad, and if we can pay the freight on our products across continents and oceans and sell them at the doors of foreign factories and in the homes of foreign labor as we are now doing, then there is no danger but that we can do so at home. It does not cheapen the cost to the consumer of an article to pay the freight on it thousands of miles. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is the familiar plea of the great captains of industry and their satellites, but we meet and refute it with the facts as published from department records.

The Leather Trust tells us if the tariff on its products is removed it can no longer operate, but must close down its plants and turn its labor out of employment, because conditions in other countries are more favorable than here, and for this reason, without a duty for protection, it can not compete with them. For answer to this contention, the customhouse reports conclusively show we are now successfully competing with foreign countries in leather goods. Take the year 1910 as a fair example. We imported $114,053 worth of boots and shoes and exported $12,408,575 worth. We imported no harness, but exported $650,000 worth. We imported uppers of the value of $3,000,000 and exported $20,000,000 worth. We imported band and sole leather of the value of $49,000 and exported $6,887,000 worth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is clearly shown by these statistics that we are competing abroad and selling there cheaper than the same products are sold here at home. The conclusion necessarily is that to remove the duty will not shut down any industry, nor turn labor out of employment, nor reduce wages. Again, the same assertion has been made here, and apparently repeated with confidence in its correctness, with reference to the manufacture of agricultural implements, which is also refuted by the statistics. Last year we manufactured $92,000,000 worth of these products. We imported none and exported $25,000,000 worth, the same going to every civilized country in the world, and after paying the transportation charges abroad, sold them there for less than they were sold to our people at home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Meat Trust, a giant monopoly, asserts unless a high tariff is maintained on its products, because of conditions in other countries, it can not operate here, and yet last year we imported no canned beef and exported $1,645,000 worth; in meat and its products we imported none and exported $160,000,000 worth.

The lumber kings are industrious in their zeal for a high duty on lumber, and yet last year the report of the revenue officials shows that we imported lumber of the value of $22,000,000 and exported $60,000,000 worth, exhausting the depleted supply in this country, and against which the protectionist has opposed all efforts of public conservation that this valuable product may not be exhausted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, the great iron and steel operators say that without a high tariff to protect their productions they can not operate and must surrender the business to foreign producers, and yet last year the revenue officials report that we imported $22,000,000 worth of these products and exported to foreign countries $144,000,000 worth. Notice some of the items of this industry. Steel rails, imports, $133,000; exports, $8,324,000. Structural iron and steel, imports, $335,000; exports, $6,954,000. Wire, round iron and steel, imports, $872,000; exports, $8,482,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The miller who fears that cheap foreign-mill products will injure his business appeals to Congress to levy a high duty on flour, and yet last year the revenue office shows that we imported $446,000 worth of flour and exported $51,000,000 worth to be sold in foreign countries in competition with all the world.

The coal operator tells the miner it is necessary to have a high duty on bituminous coal, or foreign mines will drive them out of business, yet last year we imported coal of this quality valued at $3,498,000 and exported $23,000,000 worth and sold it in competition with the coal of all the world.

Sir, we can safely appeal to the customhouse reports for an answer which will refute every contention made by the advocates of a high protective system, save the indefensible one that it creates a monopoly and enables it to extort unearned profits from the consumer, which is a self-evident fact.

The "captains of industry" demand protection because they assert that the conditions of other countries as to labor and raw materials are such that we can not compete, and because of these advantages, without protection, they are able to close down our industries and turn our labor out of employment. Our statistics show that last year our manufacturers exported products of the value of $671,000,000, an enormous amount, and sold them in the markets of every civilized country in the world. We produced sufficient to supply our wants, and this vast surplus we sent abroad to the doors of foreign plants, paid the freight, and sold them in the homes of foreign labor cheaper than they were sold at home. It will not do to say in the face of these irrefutable facts that we can not compete at home with foreign goods made by foreign labor. We can not only do so at home but we are paying the freight on our goods across the continents and oceans and are competing with them in their homes, selling as cheap or cheaper than they sell their own products. If we can do so abroad, as we are doing every year, we surely can do it here at home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a familiar plea of all protectionists that a high tariff should be levied for the benefit of labor as a shield from competition with the product of the cheap labor of other countries, and for 20 years this has been the slogan of their battle cry, until it is worn threadbare. The employer everywhere seeks labor as cheap as he can procure it. He pays no more than he is compelled to; he reduces wages on the slightest provocation and upon the flimsiest pretense. It is not the importation of cheap labor-made goods that menaces the wages of American labor, but the importation of this labor itself, supplanting our labor in our factories at home, which is yearly turning our laborers out of employment. For more than a decade foreign labor, under the direction of giant monopolies, has been pouring into our country at the rate of a million a year, taking the places of our laborers at less wages, gathering American wage remuneration and sending it back to their native country in large sums, annually diminishing the circulating capital of this country, all for the enhancement of the trusts, combines, and monopolies, under the management of the great "captains of industry." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, the beneficiaries of the system have appealed to the people to sustain its high duties because it would open the mills and create a home consumption for our surplus production. The theory that we should produce all we consume and consume all we produce is a fallacy, and if continually practiced would forever bar the way to the enrichment of our people and Nation.

If an individual, throughout his entire life, would produce all he consumed and consume all he produced he would be no better off when life ended than when it began. He had lived and that was all. What is true of the individual is true of the Nation. The wealth of both is only increased when a people produce enough to supply themselves and have a surplus left to sell to other individuals or nations, and this surplus registers the net profit for the period it covers. It is what makes them better off, increases their wealth, expands their commerce, and multiplies their prosperity. There was a time in the early period of protection when it drew capital to the country and multiplied wealth, encouraged commerce, and inspired thrift; but that time has passed. It was invoked to sustain infant industries; its advocates championed it for no other purpose and promised when that mission was fulfilled it should be abandoned, as its purpose would be completed.

But greed seized and usurped the reason, dethroned the conscience, and it was turned into a machine of oppression against the consuming masses of the most-favored country in all the world. It was converted into an instrument for extorting unearned profits and for founding combines, trusts, and monopolies, to suppress competition and paralyze development. Our factories are turning out yearly $15,000,000,000 worth of wares, produced by the brawn and brain of a progressive and intelligent people. They are made from $8,000,000,000 of raw material, with $3,000,000,000 of labor. Labor is remunerated by only one-fifth of what it produces. Four billion dollars is the net profit on an $11,000,000,000 investment. This is attractive. The division is unequal, it is unfair, and it is no wonder there is discontent. Under this distribution labor and capital are not sharing equally. Capital is protected, labor is not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The former is spared competition, while the latter is open to the competition of the world. It is for the equality of both we plead in order that contentment may prevail and prosperity abide. Sir, an unshackled commerce encourages all and stimulates the growth of each. Protection which denies the markets to all must necessarily discourage expansion of trade. The period of exclusiveness is passed if we are to find markets abroad for our surplus. Since the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Act less than two years ago more than one-half billion dollars of American capital has been withdrawn from the marts of our home trade and been taken to foreign countries by our manufacturers to build plants abroad, because our high-tariff wall excluded foreign goods from our markets; the foreigner retaliated and refused to buy our goods, and hence our people withdrew their capital from their business here and invested it in business abroad. Protection is doing this daily. Under the protective policy of the Republican Party as now enforced the trend of capital is to flow abroad instead of accumulating and multiplying the wealth of the people here at home who created it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It has been asserted by some during the course of this debate that an increase of tariff duties on any given article does not increase the price of the article to the consumer. If this be true, then the levying of protective tariff duties is of no benefit whatever to the producer. Its sole and only purpose is to enable the producer to increase the price and avoid competition from the producers of other countries. If it is added to the laborer's wage, as some contend, then it increases the cost of production, which is added to the selling price which the consumer has to pay for it. If it does not increase the price, then it is without justification, and there is no tenable ground for its defense.

Again, some have asserted the higher the duty on any article, the cheaper the article. It can be safely said that nobody ever made such an argument for the purpose of convincing any person of its truth. It contradicts itself. With propriety, we might ask how high it would be necessary to fix the duty on an article in order that consumers might procure it free of charge. One proposition is no more absurd than the other; one is equally as preposterous as the other. [Great applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, my time is rapidly passing, and I can not let this occasion pass without paying some attention to some charges preferred during the course of this debate about some familiar matters of current history. I have heard it asserted by some overenthusiastic friends of protection that the panic of 1893 was produced by Democratic legislation and Democratic policies. Will anyone point out the enactment of a single line of Democratic legislation prior to the panic of 1893 for the basis of such a charge? I pause for some one to tell this House what legislation of the Democratic Party, which came into power March 4, 1893, caused the terrible panic of that year, paralizing business, shutting down industries, turning labor out of employment, and spreading desolation from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf. There was none. The McKinley tariff law was in force then, which levied the highest duties ever known up to that time. The Wilson bill was not passed until the latter part of August, 1894, and did not become effective until October of that year. Now, how could a law not passed until August, 1894, and taking effect October, 1894, produce a panic in April, 1893? Will some wiseacre tell us?

The panic came under the high McKinley tariff law, under the enforcement of Republican policies, just as the panic of 1908 came under the Dingley law and Republican policies. Just as every panic has occurred in this country, under Republican policies and high protection, and in both, the Democratic Party was called into power to relieve the country of the business situation into which the policies of the Republican Party had plunged it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Sir, I was amused to hear my colleague [Mr. CRUMPACKER] say on the floor of this House a short time ago that the panic of 1908 was of such little consequence that it did not affect to any considerable extent the business of the country. How woefully mistaken any man is when he flatters himself with such a thought. The commercial agencies by their reports show that the business failures for the first 18 months in the panic of 1908 exceeded those for the first 18 months in the panic of 1893—$146,000,000 in amount, laying desolation throughout the length and breadth of the land, wrecking enterprise, stifling trade, and paralyzing business in every commercial mart of the country.

In 1893, while the panic raged with its most frightful consequences, there was no time but what an individual could go to his bank and draw out his own money, but not so in 1908. All over the country banks were compelled to lay an embargo on this right and refused to let the people withdraw their own funds and deposits from banks.

The public were compelled to establish soup houses in every metropolitan city in the land, and the laborers lined the public highways in quest of employment, but found it not.

Four hundred and fifty thousand freight cars stood idle on the numerous sidetracks of the various railroads of the country with their wheels rusting on the rails—a sufficient number which, if coupled together in one train, would have made a line reaching the entire distance from New York City to the city of St. Louis.

These are some of the features of the panic of 1908. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The foundations were razed from under fortunes and the wealthy became poor, and the poor made more desolate. [Applause.] But we have been told here that the success of the Democratic Party in 1892 at the election frightened the business of the country and this caused the panic of 1893. I deny it. No man of all the great men who have occupied the White House was held in as high esteem by the business men and business interests as was Grover Cleveland. The business men of the country supported him as a candidate, voted for him, and by their votes he was elected. They stood by him loyally, and if you will examine the vote of the country that year you will find the gains were made from the business sections and were made from the business men of the country. These are the facts and I challenge any man to successfully deny them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why should business, I mean legitimate business, fear the Democratic Party and its policies? The Democratic Party and its policies are now and always have been for the encouragement of every legitimate business, favoring safe and sound business principles which foster and stimulate genuine prosperity—a prosperity for all, and not a prosperity for a few, at the expense of the many. It favors a prosperity which like the dews of a generous heaven fall on all alike. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, we have been told here by the apostles of protection that business fears the action of this Democratic House. I deny it. From whence do men who so speak get their information? The public press, the independent magazines, the people approve our course, are commending our action, and are sending encouraging messages indorsing our progress and bidding us God speed in our good work. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are responding to their wishes by diligent action and conservative work, and it is meeting their approval. Tell me that business does not approve our policy, and I ask all such where did the majority in this House come from if not from the great business sections of the country? Can you point to a business center in the whole country but what made some changes from a Republican to a Democratic Member of this House. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us examine and see how the matter stands. Maine is a great business State, she had a solid Republican membership in the Sixty-first Congress; in this, the Sixty-second Congress, her delegation is equally divided in both the Senate and the House. It now has its first Democrat in the Senate since 1853. So much for that. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Rhode Island with a solid Republican representation in the last Congress comes here now in this with a divided delegation, half and half in this House. Does any one deny it to be a business State? [Applause.] In the last Congress Connecticut had a solid Republican delegation, but in this House a Democrat responds to the roll when it is called. That is a business State, too. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The great Empire State of New York, a business State, in the last Congress had 11 Democrats and 26 Republicans. The representation in this House is reversed; it stands 22 Democrats, 1 Independent, and 14 Republicans. Greater New York City, the greatest business metropolis in the country, if not in the world, sends one lonely Republican of all its membership. Who elected them if it were not the business men? And the business men of that State took a Republican out of the Senate and sent a Democrat in his place. [Great applause.] Now, who would dare say business was afraid of the Democratic Party? The great city of Buffalo had a divided delegation in the last House, but it is solidly Democratic now. Does this look like business was afraid of Democratic policies? I think not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The State of New Jersey comes next. It is the home of more big business institutions than any other State in the Union, and it has a membership of 10 in this House. In the last Congress it had 3 Democrats and 7 Republicans; it reversed exactly its representation, and now has 7 true and loyal Democrats and 3 Republicans. It also sent into retirement from the Senate a Republican and put in his place as true and loyal a Democrat as ever lived, the Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE. Does this indicate that business is afraid of the Democratic Party? [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

West Virginia is a great business State. In the last Congress it had a solid Republican delegation; to-day it has four good and true Democrats and only one lonely Republican to answer the roll call. It also sent two Democrats to the Senate. Business interests in that State it seems are not afraid of the Democratic Party. [Applause.] Ohio, the home of the President, is one of the greatest business States in the Union. In the last Congress it had 8 Democrats and 13 Republicans, and both Senators were Republicans. In this Congress it has 1 Democratic Senator, 16 Democrats in the House and only 5 Republicans. Does anyone believe that the business men of Ohio fear the Democratic Party? I do not. [Great applause.]

Pennsylvania and Illinois, both great business States, and from their business centers have increased their Democratic representation as an indorsement of their faith in Democratic policies. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A MEMBER. How about Indiana?

Mr. CULLOP. Indiana is all right. Just keep your eye on it. Two Democratic Senators are credited now to Indiana and 12 out of the 13 Members of this House are Democrats, and we expect to have a solid delegation in the next House. We will sweep the Republican Party off of the map at the next election, and we are anxious for the contest. [Great applause on the Democratic side.] Do we need more or better proof than this that business indorses our policies, inaugurated them, and approves their adoption? We are opposed by a hostile Senate and Executive, and can not carry them fully into complete execution. However, we should not falter, but adopt Democratic policies as far as we can and give the people as much relief as possible from the burdens imposed on them by 14 years of unbroken rule by the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Since this Democratic House convened business conditions all over the country have improved, as evidence of confidence in our ability to solve correctly the great business questions with which we are to deal. Since this bill was presented to this House the price of raw wool has advanced 5 cents a pound. What better evidence could be produced for the approval of our course by the business interests of the country? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In conclusion, my Democratic brethren, we must falter not, but proceed to perform the duty for which we were commissioned by the people at the last election. We are on trial, and thus far the verdict of popular approval commends our course. Greater responsibilities will fall to us if we but do our duty well. The final battle is to be fought next year, and if we but follow the mandate of the people in the prosecution of our work a sweeping victory will be the reward. A united party can accomplish much, but divided we can never succeed; harmony of forces and harmony of action will assure a complete triumph. The time and opportunity are both present and let us seize and use them, for it would be cruel to waste either. The enemy is on the retreat, its ranks are broken, its fortifications are down, its legions are scattered and fighting each other, and certain victory is assured us if we will enter the approaching contest with a determination which the occasion inspires. Choose for the leadership in the great contest of 1912 any of the great men whose names illumine our party's history; adopt a platform of principles which shall declare the true Democratic doctrine, free of all alliances with special interests, and no power on earth can the opposition invoke which will disturb or embarrass our march to certain victory or the triumph of our cause. The marshaled hosts of Democracy are in the field ready for the contest, and impatiently await the command to engage in the conflict for the triumph of our cause—the people's cause—the application of Democratic principles to the administration of national affairs and the restoration of business to a safe and sound basis, in order that prosperity may be restored to all the people. In such a contest three-fourths of the States in this Union will indorse our conduct by giving their electoral vote to the Democratic candidates. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak upon this bill. I intended merely to content myself with voting for it. I am not a partisan upon tariff questions, and in my optimism I had hoped that the Democracy, as you say, fresh from the people, with the mandate of that people in their hands, would at least leave out of this bill that timeworn and threadbare provision, "made wholly or in part of wool," a provision which makes the schedule applicable to everything with even the slightest part of wool in it, from wool-lined rubber boots to wool-upholstered furniture, from all-wool worsted clothing to mercerized cotton with wool polka dots. But I recognize how futile it is to say anything in the face of a militant but caucus-tied and gagged majority, pledged to vote down any amendment, however meritorious.

I recognize that nothing that I could say or that any man can say will change by the addition or subtraction of 1 per cent any of the schedules of this bill; and I rise now only for the purpose of presenting certain tables, which I have prepared with some labor and burning of the midnight oil, and which I am optimistic enough to think will prove of interest to the Members of this House and to the country.

In preparing these tables I have taken as a basis the statistical tables prepared by Samuel S. Dale, editor of the Textile World Record, and which were presented by the late Senator Dolliver, of Iowa, as the basis of his remarks upon the wool schedule in the tariff debate of two years ago in the United States Senate. Dolliver was a star among the actors in the drama of life. His light has gone out. But the radiance of his intellect still sheds its brilliance upon this subject. [Applause.] Time dulls the enthusiasm for ideals and dims the luster of the memory of man, but Dolliver's contributions to tariff knowledge, perpetuated in the morocco-bound volumes of the RECORD, still shed a light upon the pathway of him who would travel the intricate mazes of the wool schedule. [Applause.] So I feel that I need make no apology in basing the tables which I present upon the analysis and statistics presented by Senator Dolliver in the debate of two years ago.

Mr. Dale, who made the analysis of the cloth which are the foundation of my figures, was for many years the manager of a woolen mill, and for many more has been intimately connected with the woolen industry. The accuracy of his figures has not and, I think, can not be successfully contested. For the purpose of ascertaining the exact relation between the compensatory and protective duty under the Dingley and Payne bills he made an analysis of 11 different woolen cloths, determining by that analysis the exact proportion of grease wool, shoddy, and cotton in each. With this exact knowledge of the contents of the cloth in wool, shoddy, and cotton he was able to determine the exact proportion of compensatory and protective duty provided by the tariffs of the wool schedule of the Dingley and Payne laws. I will print the analysis made by Mr. Dale, together with his conclusions as to the amount of compensatory and protective duty upon each of these woolen cloths provided by the Payne and Dingley laws.

Taking Mr. Dale's analysis of each of these cloths as a basis, I have prepared some tables showing the amount of compensatory and protective duties upon each, applying thereto the duties provided by the pending bill. In order to conform to the change in the pending bill from the specific basis provided by the Payne law to the ad valorem basis provided by the pending bill, it was necessary to determine upon some basis of value for the grease wool and shoddy contained in the cloth. In ascertaining that basis I thought it was fair to take the average import price of wool in the grease and have taken as that basis 24 cents a pound, the average import price of raw wool in the year 1909; and as a basis of value for the shoddy I have taken 12 cents per pound which I believe is slightly in excess of the average foreign price of shoddy. It is, of course, true that there would be some slight deviation from this value in the cloth by reason of the fact that in making the cloth the price of the wool might be slightly more or less than these figures. But taking an average of the results of these figures upon 11 different pieces of cloth necessarily results in a fairly accurate conclusion as to the actual compensatory and protective duties provided by the various tariffs levied by this bill. Now, I do not intend to make an explanation in detail of the analysis of these tables as they speak very largely for themselves, but I do desire to make a brief explanation of one of them as a demonstration that will apply to all.

I refer now to piece A207 cotton warp casket cloth. This piece runs 15½ ounces per yard, 68 inches wide; 10,000 yards at 50 cents per yard; 9,688 pounds of cloth. This cloth will require in its manufacture 2,375 pounds of cotton warp, 1,600 pounds of grease wool, 1,125 pounds of raw cotton, and 9,563 pounds of shoddy. The Dingley duty upon this cloth, figured upon the basis of 4 pounds of grease wool, at a tariff duty of 11 cents a pound, to 1 pound of cloth was 44 cents per pound on the cloth and 50 per cent ad valorem.

Applying this basis to the cloth mentioned, we have 9,688 pounds of cloth at 44 cents duty per pound, amounting to $4,262.72, or an equivalent ad valorem of 85.2 per cent, and in addition a duty of 50 per cent on $5,000, the value of the cloth, or $2,500, making a total compensatory and protective duty of $6,672.72, equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 135.2. Now, applying the Dingley duty to the actual amount of compensatory duty required by the contents of the cloth in grease wool and shoddy gives the following result:

One thousand six hundred pounds of grease wool at 11 cents per pound—the Dingley tariff—amounts to $1,760, and, adding a compensatory duty of 5 cents per pound upon the 9,563 pounds of shoddy contained in the cloth, amounting to $478.15, gives us an actual required compensatory duty amounting to $2,238.15, equivalent to 44.8 per cent ad valorem; leaving an actual protection upon the cloth, valued at $5,000, of $4,524.57, equivalent to 90.4 per cent ad valorem.

Now, I propose to take the same piece of cloth and apply to its dutiable contents the rates of duty provided by this bill. Figuring the dutiable contents of the cloth, 1,600 pounds of grease wool at 24 cents a pound, gives the grease wool value in the cloth at $384; taking 9,563 pounds of shoddy at 12 cents per pound gives us the value of the shoddy contents of the cloth at $1,147.56; then, applying a 20 per cent ad valorem rate provided in this bill to the $1,531.56 in value of its dutiable contents, gives us an actual required compensatory duty amounting to $306.20, or an ad valorem equivalent on the value of the cloth of 6.12. The duty of 40 per cent on the value of the cloth at $5,000 amounts to $2,000, leaving an actual protection under this bill of $1,693.80, equivalent to an ad valorem of 33.88 per cent.

I submit that this is a very generous and healthy protection upon a piece of cloth 36 per cent of which in weight is cotton produced in this country and upon which there is no duty whatever. I ask leave at this point to print the tables prepared by Mr. Dale and by myself.

Without going into details of these tables, they show actual compensatory duties under the schedules of the pending bill running from 3 per cent to 18 per cent and actual protective duties running from 21 per cent to 37 per cent. They show an average compensatory duty on the 11 pieces of cloth of 11.74 per cent and an average protective duty of 29.62 per cent.

If there is any gentleman on that side of the House who can justify an average protection of approximately 30 per cent on the principle of a tariff for revenue, I would be glad to have him do it. The tables on piece A96 cotton warp dress goods show an actual compensatory duty of 8.66 per cent and an actual protection of 36.34 per cent. If there is any gentleman on the other side of the middle aisle who can justify a rate of 45 per cent, of which more than 36 per cent is protection, on ladies' cotton warp dress goods, I should be glad to have him make that demonstration. To claim that a bill providing protection averaging 30 per cent is a purely revenue measure is a nonsensical absurdity so profound as to startle the brain of an idiot.

There are gentlemen on this side of the aisle who, I think, believe, with honest conviction, that the rate of protection afforded by this bill is too low. I do not share that opinion, for such information as I have been able to gather leads me to the conclusion that a protection of 30 per cent upon the value of the cloth is ample to protect the manufacturer of woolen cloths in this country against the cheaper labor of foreign countries.

Shortly prior to the debate of two years ago in the Senate on the wool schedule Mr. W. A. Graham Clark, special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, made an extended and careful investigation and analysis of the cost of production of woolen yarns and cloth in this and several foreign countries.

He prepared, after a thorough investigation, a list of tables showing the various items of cost entering into the production of woolen yarns and cloth, and I print at this point one of these tables as an illustration of the thoroughness and care with which Mr. Clark investigated the subject.

The table referred to shows a labor cost in the production of fancy worsted suiting of 23.5 per cent, and an examination of all the tables prepared by Mr. Clark leads to the conclusion that the labor cost of production seldom exceeds 25 per cent of the value of the cloth itself. The table of wages prepared by Clark shows that the wages paid in this country on all classes of employment in the manufacture of yarn and cloth is from 17 to 125 per cent higher than in England. While I believe that there is every reason to think that the average difference in cost of production is considerably less than 100 per cent, in order to be on the safe side, as a protectionist, I have assumed for the purpose of this argument that the labor cost in this country is double the labor cost in foreign countries. So that taking the labor cost in the production of woolen cloth in foreign countries at 25 per cent of the value of the cloth a protection of 25 per cent ad valorem would cover this difference. It must therefore be apparent that the protection afforded by this bill is amply sufficient, so far as the manufacturer of woolen cloth is concerned, and that the pending bill is not only an abandonment by our Democratic friends of the policy of free wool, but a betrayal as well of the doctrine of tariff for revenue only.

The present Schedule K of the Payne bill, covering wool and manufactures thereof, was written into the tariff law in 1867, and has been reenacted substantially in the same form in every Republican tariff measure from that day to this. It was compiled through the various grades of manufacture, washed and scoured wool, yarn and cloth, according to a system of mathematically compounded, frenzied high finance, that, piling one duty upon another, resulted in a schedule that has, not unreasonably, I think, been called the "citadel of protection." I have no doubt that its provisions were adapted to and warranted by the necessities, conditions, and environments of our then infant woolen industries. But wonderful changes have taken place in the method and cost of production of woolen and worsted fabric since that day and generation. The importation of foreign labor and the improvement of machinery has greatly reduced the labor cost in the finished article. It is claimed that the Worsted Trust dominates and controls not alone the market for its products, but in a measure the price of raw wool to the producer in this country. It is not strange that in the application of this schedule to the changed conditions that forty-odd years of development have evolved in the manufacture of wool cloth that great discrimination between manufacturers of different kinds of cloth, inequalities between the woolgrower and manufacturer, and injustice to the consumer have resulted.

The imposition of a specific duty upon raw wool, regardless of its value or shrinkage in the scouring, and the imposition of a high duty upon noils and other by-products of worsted manufacture and shoddy has resulted in a discrimination against the manufacturer of woolen cloth, as distinguished from worsted cloth, that has kept the woolen industry at a standstill for many years. I have no quarrel with the manufacturers of cloth of wool. I desire as a protectionist that they should have all the protection that the difference in the cost of manufacture warrants. But such investigation as I have been able to make indicates that the operation of Schedule K in later years has been detrimental to the development of the industry engaged in the manufacture of cloth of wool as a whole.

It ought not to occasion great surprise that methods and practices have been evolved whereby the provisions of the law and the duties imposed upon raw wool have been, in effect at least, evaded so that the woolgrower has received the benefits of a protection upon his products not exceeding 6 cents per pound, and I believe in many instances less than that. Two things have conduced very largely to this result—one is the discrimination in the law which admits washed wool of the second class at the same specific rate of duty as on grease wool of that class, while it imposes double the specific duty on washed wool of the first class that it imposes on grease wool of that class. The effect of this discrimination and of the specific duty on grease wool generally has been to exclude the heavier-shrinking wool and induce the importation of light-shrinking wools, with the ultimate result of very materially reducing the actual protection to the woolgrower. The general arrangement of Schedule K has also conduced to this result by producing a situation which has enabled the buyer and manufacturer of wool to in some measure, at least, control the domestic price to the producer.

I print at this point the following tables, showing the prices of foreign and domestic wool for the last 20 years, by semi-decades, as follows: First, the Boston price of 13 domestic wools; second, the average foreign or import price of wool; third, the London price of 6 foreign wools; fourth, the Boston price of 6 foreign wools; and, fifth, a recapitulation of the averages of the first four tables.

I think that a study of these tables will bear out the conclusions that I have mentioned. These tables show a difference of approximately 3 cents per pound between the Boston price of the domestic wool and the London price of foreign wool, but it is probable that this does not measure the whole difference, so far as the domestic producer is concerned by reason of a cheaper rate of water transportation of foreign wool than can be obtained by the domestic producer for railroad transportation. But to me the significance of the situation shown by these tables is to be found in the very much higher price of foreign wools upon the Boston market in comparison with the price of domestic wool upon that market. This situation points, it seems to me, directly to the conclusion that the manufacturer has been importing a high grade shrinking wool, that the woolgrower has not been very greatly advantaged by the supposed duty of 11 cents a pound on grease wool, and that the domestic price is very largely controlled by the user of wool for manufacture.

The consumer, however, has been the chief sufferer from these discriminations, for upon him necessarily falls the entire burden.

In conclusion, let me say that I do not consider the pending bill a perfect one, and it is to be regretted that Democratic caucus action will probably prevent the passage of any amendments looking toward an approximation of that perfection. It is to be regretted that it will probably not be possible to eliminate from the bill the iniquitous clause "in whole or in part of wool" and other provisions which the science of the present day make possible of elimination. Nor must it be inferred that I indorse the Democratic proposal to go still further in the reduction of the schedules of this bill. On the contrary, I shall in the future vote for such increases of duty as an investigation of facts and conditions may show to be warranted.

It is to be regretted that we have not before us a report of the Tariff Board upon this schedule, which would make possible a scientific determination of all of the numerous and intricate questions which an examination of this schedule suggests. I have done what I could to get this information. And in its absence it becomes necessary to arrive at some conclusion regarding the pending bill upon the information which is at hand.

Upon all of the considerations that I have enumerated I find it difficult to vote to retain Schedule K of the Payne bill, with all its discriminations, inequalities, and injustices, which is the effect of a vote against the pending bill. If the time ever comes when caucuses do not dominate and control the action of a majority, when we shall have definite and accurate information gathered by a tariff board, we may build a wool schedule in which well-considered tariffs will be scientifically applied to known necessities and conditions and the burden of taxation justly and equitably apportioned. But until that times comes I intend to do whatever I may to lift from the backs of the people the great and unequal burdens of the existing wool schedule. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore said in this Congress and during the last campaign that I believe that tariff modification should follow the report of the Tariff Board. I feel that that position is correct, in view of the fact that the Tariff Board will be required by law to make its report not later than the 1st of December of this year, and then there will undoubtedly be placed before this body such information as will enable the Congress to enact a schedule touching our wools and woolens that will commend itself not only to the good judgment of the Members of this body, but as well to the approval of the country at large. I believe that plan to be wiser than the plan the House seems bent upon now, to refuse to await the report, when in all human probability this schedule can not be modified until the report shall have been received. I believe the House should have the benefit of the valuable information that this report will contain, as well as the Senate. I have just that faith in the American people that prompts me to say that they desire nothing but the square deal, and that they desire a reduction in the tariff only to the extent that there will be removed from the tariff the possibility for exorbitant prices to be charged by those who may be in control of special commodities when any kind of competition within this country would warrant a lower price.

MODIFICATION OF WOOL SCHEDULE.

I have no patience with those who urge that we "stand pat" on Schedule K and refuse to recognize errors, however glaring, and I say to those Republicans who feel this way that they are following a most shortsighted policy and are contributing to their own retribution. It is the wise course to place every schedule on a basis that will command the respect of the people of our country.

For my part I do not defend Schedule K. Repeatedly during the last two years have I called attention to the inequalities that exist in that schedule, and repeatedly have I urged that that schedule should be modified at the very earliest practicable date by our Congress. I do not propose in what I shall say to go into great detail in pointing out inequalities that exist in that schedule. I believe that the schedule, as pertains to the manufacture of worsteds especially, is unreasonable, because, in the first place, the compensating duty that is given to the manufacturer is far in excess of what it ought to be, as I think a few words will illustrate.

Under the present law we place a duty of 11 cents per pound upon wool in the grease. We then give a compensating duty—to refer to one paragraph of the law—of 44 cents per pound upon all classes of goods that will require, theoretically, 4 pounds of raw wool to make. If 4 pounds of wool were actually used in the manufacture of a pound of cloth of this character, the compensating duty would be just and uniform; but such is not the case. It is a fact that needs no amplification upon my part that in many instances instead of the best of 4 pounds of wool being used for the manufacture of a pound of cloth that is protected on the basis of 4 pounds of wool to a pound of cloth only 3 pounds, 2½ pounds, or 2 pounds, or even less, are used. Manifestly the manufacturer is given an unreasonable advantage by reason of this inequality in the practical working out of the compensatory duty that he is entitled to under our tariff system. I could use the same illustration with respect to the different classes of manufactured goods, but it is not necessary. I could go on further and point out that, in addition to this, the manufacturer has the use of the surplus that does not enter into the pound of cloth; and this he uses for the manufacture of some other piece of woolen goods; or if he has discarded the poorer parts that are classified as noils, he can use this in places where a cheaper class of wool will suffice.

I am frank to say that I believe that the manufacturer is entitled to a compensatory duty. I do not believe that he should be required to pay a higher price for his wool in the United States by reason of a tariff if he shall not be granted at the same time the benefit of a compensatory duty on his manufactured goods that will equal the duty that is afforded the grower of wool. Again, the manufacturer is given, as I believe, and as I believe many manufacturers are willing to admit, a higher specific duty than that which represents the cost of production in the United States and in foreign countries. To the extent that this duty is in excess of the difference of cost of production in our country and in foreign countries, it should be scaled down so that no greater difference shall be represented, and so that at the very moment that the consumer is asked to pay a price for any commodity in excess of the cost of producing that commodity in the United States he will be immediately met by a competing commodity.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

I said a little while ago that I have felt that tariff modification should follow along the lines of the finding of the Tariff Board. I am a firm believer in the maintenance by this country of a tariff commission that may be regarded as a permanent institution, and that will be required to furnish to Congress such facts touching the cost of production of all competing goods in the United States and in foreign countries. The need for such a commission is apparent now as never before, and the need for this commission has developed with the rapidity that those interested in various productive lines have concentrated their wealth and have eliminated the element of competition. At a time when competition was the great adjuster of trade conditions we had no need for a tariff board. At a time when in all the various lines of manufacture—for I take it that production upon the farm can not be concentrated under one control—at a time, I say, when in the production of manufactured commodities competition was playing so keen a part that each producer was seeking to invade the territory of his rival, not only in the selling of his goods at the lowest price possible, but in the making of his goods in the best workmanlike manner possible, there was no need for a tariff board.

But in the economic evolution that has been going on during the past comparatively few years more and more organizations have been perfected in the various lines of production and distribution, organizations which now have reached the point that they can dominate not only the prices at which commodities shall be sold or services shall be rendered, but dominate as well the prices that shall be paid to the farmer in the purchase of raw materials and to the laborer for his work.

Hence I say that if prior to recent years there was no necessity for a Tariff Board in the history of our country, the very change that has been brought about in the economic conditions that have attended our people for the last score years has brought with it the necessity for such a board. Under the old system if a tariff was too high the great and inviolable law of competition guaranteed the square deal to the consumer upon the one hand and to the producer of raw materials upon the other. With the elimination of that law, unless the Government shall see to it that the protection afforded any industry does not exceed the difference in the cost of production in foreign countries and at home, the capital invested in that industry will have it in its power through organization to dominate the market, to fix the price of the raw materials and of the manufactured product, and to receive as so much "velvet" for its pains in organizing that which the consumer may be required to pay in excess of the difference in cost of production in our country and in foreign lands.

SCHEDULE K.

As regards Schedule K, I believe that not only the highest good of the people generally demands a speedy modification of that schedule, but I believe that the highest good of every grower of wool and of every manufacturer demands that at the very earliest possible time the schedule may be shaped along such lines as will commend itself to the confidence of the American people, upon the principle that reasonable and fair returns upon an investment that may be counted upon to continue over a long period of years are far more satisfactory than great returns upon an industry that may be brought to ruin as a result of public opinion that shall have been wrought upon by reason of unjust conditions until it finally shall demand relief. I believe we are now dangerously near that condition in this country.

There were those interested not only in woolgrowing, but in the manufacturing of woolens, two years ago, who urged that reasonable concessions be made in the woolen schedules. There were others, and they seemed to be able to dominate the situation, who would listen to nothing less than the most extreme bill that could possibly be framed. Their folly has well nigh pulled down the pillars of their temple, and now, before public sentiment shall have finally demanded such extreme legislation as will complete their utter ruin, let them join in an earnest manner with the great body of people of our country and help to frame at the earliest moment such a law touching wools and woolens as will commend itself to the honest judgment of the American people.

THE PENDING BILL.

The bill that is before us for consideration, I am sorry to say, it is not possible to amend by taking from or by adding to. The bill in the form that it is drawn will undoubtedly be passed by the majority in this House. They have tied themselves hand and foot by a caucus rule which prevents them from accepting any amendment, however reasonable, however much it may add to the merit of the bill. That fact, however, will not prevent me from calling attention to one or two features of the bill that the State that I have the honor to represent has vital interest in.

IDAHO'S INTEREST IN WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mine is a State that produces the raw material. It is an agricultural State. Idaho last year produced wool to such an extent as gave her the rank of third among the States of the Union. The producers of wool in my State are kindred to the producers of wool throughout the United States, and the total number of woolgrowers, in a small and a large way, throughout the United States aggregates between three-quarters of a million and a million people. These are directly interested in the industry. There are, in addition to this, millions of people who have an indirect interest that can not be overlooked. The future of this great industry in our country may depend upon the action that shall be taken by the present Congress in connection with this bill. There has not been the sentiment throughout the country that the woolgrower is responsible for the inequalities in Schedule K.

You must look some place else to find the "Jonah." It may be that the protection accorded to the woolgrower is too high, it may be that it is too low. I have felt that we should be governed in this in very large degree by the report that will be made not later than next December on the cost of growing wool within the United States and in foreign countries.

For my own benefit, I have made something of an examination of this question, and I find some very interesting figures in connection with the cost of production of wool in this country and in foreign countries. In my State, for instance, the time has passed when we had large and unlimited areas of land upon which sheep might be grazed. The time has passed when there was little or no competition, and the time has come when there is great competition to see who shall control, either by ownership or by lease, every available acre upon which sheep may be grown. In my State sheep herders can be employed only by paying them from $35 to $50 per month; and last year probably the largest stock company in my State paid as high as $70 per month for this class of labor. In addition to this, these men have to be kept, and this requires a cost of from $12.50 to $16 each per month. In this connection touching the matter of expense I invite attention to the testimony of Mr. F. J. Hagenbarth and Mr. A. J. Knollin, of Idaho, given before the Senate Finance Committee on the 19th and 22d of last month. More than this, the time has passed when not only good business instinct but humanitarianism demands that the sheep shall not be compelled to take a chance on living through the winter on the range, but hay must be provided, and the hay at probably a fair average per sheep would cost something like 20 cents each for the season. Our lands that are leased from the Government from the forest reserves require a rental of something like from 7 to 9 cents per acre, and besides this large sums must be expended in valuable lands and for necessary improvements.

CONDITIONS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Now, let us compare the conditions that I have suggested with the conditions in other countries that compete with us. In Great Britain, in the counties of Kent and Surrey, according to the report of the American consul submitted last year, sheep herders can be employed at a cost of $5.34 per week, and the sheep herders are required to "keep" themselves. They may be employed for $4.86 per week and be furnished cottages and little plots of ground for garden purposes. In another part of the United Kingdom I found that foremen were employed by the year at from $121.66 to $146 and "keep." The wages of horsemen and other farm hands was far below this. In Australia a report that I have and that was made by our consul general at Sydney, at the time the Payne law was being considered, tells us that the wages of sheep "drivers" is $5 per week, including board, and of the more experienced men from $7.50 to $10 per week, including "keep." Not only that, but the difference in wages between Australia and the United States does not represent the difference in cost of production of wool. In the United States a sheep herder, for instance, will be required to take care of something like 1,700 head of sheep. He will be given a camp tender, and the expenses of them both will need to be charged against a flock of sheep of this size. In Australia I am advised that they do not have herders in the sense that we have herders, but they have what they call their "riders," and with the large range and ample fencing one rider is able to care for and supervise not less than 2,000 head of sheep, as in this country, but many thousands of sheep, and he is paid for his labor a compensation that is something like one-half of that which is paid in my own State. The winters there are open and the sheep may run at large upon the range during a season that is most expensive to the American sheep grower. In addition to this, instead of being required to pay from 7 to 9 cents per acre for grazing purposes, the owners of the herds may lease hundreds of thousands of acres at 2 cents per acre, or, in other words, for something like 25 per cent of the cost of leasing our land for similar purposes, and the land that the sheep growers own is of small value in comparison with the land in the United States.

In South America conditions are even worse, and the wages paid something like one-third of the wages paid within the United States. In Europe, in Asia, and in Africa conditions are infinitely worse, and I hesitate to say that in some places sheep herders are paid as low as 25 and 50 cents per week in addition to their "keep" for services for which we pay $10 to $15 per week and board.

I do not mention these figures and conditions with any idea of finality. I do mention them to call attention to the important fact that there is a difference in cost of production at home over the cost of production in foreign countries. I do not believe that the American people expect the growers of sheep and the producers of wool to employ peasant methods of caring for their flocks and compensating their workmen, and I do believe that right here is the great opportunity for the Tariff Board to point out the difference between the cost of production in foreign countries and at home. I would not have you understand that I believe that the measure of cost of production is entirely a question of wages. I was much interested in the address of Representative REDFIELD, of New York, the other day, and I was much impressed by what he said with respect to the greater efficiency of American labor over the underpaid and underfed labor of foreign countries. At the same time it can not be overlooked that the difference in this cost of labor does represent a factor of great importance and one that we can not fail to take cognizance of in the consideration of this important question.

The schedule that is proposed in the bill that has been reported by Mr. UNDERWOOD furnishes practically no protection to growers of wool. For instance, a 20 per cent ad valorem duty gives an apparent protection to our growers of something like 4 or 5 cents per pound. Just at this time it would not be so much. It costs the grower of wool in Australia 1¼ to 1½ cents per pound to ship his wool by steamer from Sydney to Boston, and it costs him but 1⅛ to 1⅜ cents per pound if he ships it by sailing vessels.

The woolgrower of South America can ship his wool to these same markets from his ports for three-eighths of a cent per pound. It costs the woolgrower of Idaho from 1¾ to 2¼ cents per pound to ship his wool to the Philadelphia, New York, or Boston market. But Australian and South American wool shrinks but little more than half as much as Idaho wool shrinks, and while it requires 3 pounds of our wool to make a pound of scoured wool it requires only a little more than 1½ pounds of Australian or South American wool to make the same quantity. As a matter of fact, then, the freight rates on Australian or South American wool are from ¾ to 2¼ cents per pound on the basis of scoured wool, while to reach the same market the scoured wool of Idaho must pay 6 cents per pound. In other words, although the Idaho woolgrower under the proposed bill will have in his favor a duty of, say, 5 cents per pound, he is required to turn a large part of it over immediately to the railroad company, in order that he may have his wool hauled to the same market in which the wool of his Australian or South American competitor is offered for sale.

Even under the present tariff law the manufacturer has had an unfair advantage over the grower of wool, as I intimated a little while ago, because of his ability to buy wool in the grease in foreign countries, whose shrinkage is half or less than half the shrinkage of the wool of the American producer. If under the present law wool is washed or scoured it is required to pay twice the duty that would be asked if it were not washed, and three times the duty if scoured, over what it would pay if in the grease. The woolen manufacturer has been able to bring in wool from foreign countries the shrinkage of which has been as low as 12 and 15 per cent, and from this up to 50 per cent, with little above that figure, while the shrinkage of the wool of Idaho, for instance, is something like 67 per cent.

With the skirting clause inserted in the Payne law, large quantities of wool have been imported on the skin, with the skirt of the fleece removed, or, in other words, the very part of the fleece that was filled with dirt removed and not required to be used in bringing down the average quality of the wool as against our domestic growers.

Suppose the shrinkage on foreign wool were as great as 33⅓ per cent, with the apparent duty of 11 cents per pound upon wool in the grease, the manufacturer would be enabled to import wool to such an extent as would bring down the actual protection to our wool producer, under the present law, as low as 5½ cents per pound. However, as I said, some of the wool goes even beyond that and the duty is but a few cents.

SCOURED WOOL THE TRUE BASIS.

I believe that the true basis for the tariff upon wool should be figured upon scoured wool. Here is a weakness in the Payne law, and in the Underwood bill as well, and I propose at the proper time to offer an amendment on this head. Scoured wool would furnish a basis that would be fair and equitable to the woolgrower, fair and equitable to the woolen and worsted manufacturers. It would be absurd to talk about a bushel of wheat that to one person would weigh out 15 pounds, to another one 30 pounds, and to another one 60 pounds; and yet, using wool in the grease as the unit or basis for our tariff schedules we are committing as great an absurdity, because wool in the grease may mean wool that contains so much dirt that its shrinkage will be even more than 67 per cent, as it is in my State, or it may be less than 15 per cent, as some of the wool that is sold in the market.

A wool buyer may go to my State and pay one price for his wool. He may go to the State of Oregon, where possibly different conditions prevail, and he may pay another price for his wool. The wool will be shipped to the scouring plant, and when it shall have been scoured it will be found that because of the different shrinkage of the two classes of wool that the wool bought has been purchased, as a matter of fact, at the same price.

It will be urged that this method of placing a duty upon wool can not be sustained because of the difficulty in reducing all wool to the basis of scoured wool. In answer to that I would say that there is not the slightest merit in this contention. Any purchaser of wool who has enough experience and ability to be intrusted by any woolen concern interested in the purchase or the sale of wool knows how to reduce wool to the equivalent of a scoured basis upon the most superficial examination of the wool that is brought before him for him to purchase.

For instance, wool buyers will visit a warehouse in my State, they will take several samples of wool, they will separately and apart offer bids upon the wool based upon a certain shrinkage, and they will not miss the same percentage of shrinkage by more than one-half of 1 per cent as the usual thing. If this can be done by men in the rough and tumble of life in the buying of wool, surely as accurate work could be done by the employees of the Government at the customhouses; and any manufacturer of wool whose buyers do not reduce the wool which they buy to the equivalent of scoured wool and do not know how to so reduce it is doing business upon a most dangerous basis, and bankruptcy for him would seem to be a matter of the merest chance. The true basis to be used upon which to rest protection for the wool industry is the basis of scoured wool.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman there for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That can be done in a mere washtub.

Mr. FRENCH. It can be done with the very same means that has been indicated—any means of that kind. The wool buyers, as I have said, will go to the warehouse in the gentleman's State, pick out a few bunches of wool here and there from that which is offered for sale, and the different buyers, each one of them separately, will prepare the bids that they will offer upon it, and will come to practically the same bid, because they are able to figure out within the fraction of less than 1 per cent the exact amount of scoured wool that will be offered for sale.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Is that not true in all the sales in the western country? You will find a man so expert in even the feeling of the wool as to be able to determine what it will amount to in the washed state, although it is in the grease state.

Mr. FRENCH. Absolutely; and hence I say it ought to be a comparatively easy thing, if this can be done in the rough and ready way in that part of the western country, for our Government to employ experts who will be able to tell immediately on slight examination exactly how much scoured wool there is in any cargo that may be landed in any part of the country.

The woolgrower now has an apparent protection of 11 cents per pound on wool, but with light-shrinking wool imported the actual protection is less than that amount. An equivalent of 11 cents per pound on wool in the grease, as it now is, would be 33 cents per pound on scoured wool. I would suggest a flat duty of 30 cents, or possibly 25 cents, on scoured wool as a basis, and then require all wools imported to be reduced to that basis. I propose at the proper time to introduce an amendment on this head. This would constitute a rate on scoured wool less than the present rate, and would establish the right balance that ought to exist between the woolgrower and the manufacturer. It would eliminate entirely the duty of 11 cents per pound on wool in the grease and the duty of 22 cents per pound on washed wool, under which there has been so much of juggling by the importer, and in its place there would be established a basis that would be fair to all alike and easily understood.

AD VALOREM V. SPECIFIC DUTIES.

I do not believe that the ad valorem basis is the best revenue basis from the standpoint of protection or from the standpoint of revenue as regards raw wool. Here is another weakness of the pending bill: From the standpoint of protection the ad valorem basis utterly fails, for it places the highest duty on foreign wool when it is the highest and the lowest duty when it is the lowest.

It applies the law that has been stated in these words: "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath." In other words, the very years in which the world's supply is excessive and when the wool is offered on the market at a low price, the very years when our woolgrowers need protection, those years we have the minimum of protection under the ad valorem system. The years that wool is scarce and when the price is high the ad valorem system puts the price still higher, because the duty must increase as the price increases.

I do not believe the ad valorem system meets a better test from the revenue point of view. A given amount of wool might yield in one year upon the ad valorem basis $10,000,000 in revenue, while another year the same wool might not yield one-third that amount of revenue by reason of the low price of wool.

Again, I am opposed to the ad valorem basis, for it will mean that the cheapest kinds of wool will be brought into this country and sold to the American consumer in the clothes he buys. Under the specific basis our buyers would select the best. Under the ad valorem basis the best will be left abroad and the cheaper wool will be brought to this country, for if the better were brought the price would be compounded, for the simple reason that the wool is better and has a higher value in the market.

On the manufactured products probably a combination of ad valorem and specific duties should be established—the specific to meet the compensatory duties on the raw material and the ad valorem to meet the difference in cost of poduction of the manufactured products in foreign countries and in our own.

I believe in tariff modification and not tariff agitation, and in conclusion, and with the end in view of doing away with tariff agitation, I am going to urge the members of my own party in this Chamber to listen no longer to those who urge the sacredness of Schedule K, but to assist in bringing about at the earliest practicable moment modifications along those lines that experience has demonstrated are imperative. Then, and then only, will you have acquitted yourselves so as to bring to you the approval of your constituents. And then you will have aided in placing this great business upon a basis that will be firm and stable, because its foundations will be grounded in absolute justice.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY].

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool will receive practically a unanimous vote on the Democratic side of this Chamber, and will be supported by at least a few members on the Republican side. The situation from the point of view of the Democratic Party is a very gratifying one. It is, I believe, to the credit of the Democratic membership of this body that we have been able to agree with practical unanimity on the course to be pursued in the revision of Schedule K, and, Mr. Chairman, it is no less to the credit of the Democratic membership that there have been honest and frank differences of opinion among the Democrats. It is a sign of the freedom of thought within our party, and at the same time a sign of the party's fitness to administer the affairs of our Government, that we can think differently and by somewhat conflicting processes of reasoning, and yet, making concessions respecting details, reach a substantial agreement upon the important things which we have been sent here to accomplish.

The pending bill seems to me an exact and literal fulfillment of the Democratic platform adopted at Denver in 1908, so far as Schedule K is concerned. And I state this opinion with all deference and respect to those good Democrats who interpret the platform somewhat differently and sincerely believe that the party was pledged to free wool and to a more radical cut in the rates on the manufactures of wool.

The Democratic platform of 1908 specified that pulp, print paper, lumber, timber, and logs should be placed upon the free list. No other article was specified in this connection. It was declared that—

> Material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home, and graduated reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

Wool and woolens must be considered necessities of life, and therefore the platform calls for a material reduction. There can be no doubt that the reduction herein proposed is material. The latter part of the sentence I have quoted from the platform, calling for graduated reductions, seems to me to carry a promise of conservatism in dealing with the tariff, a promise upon which the people of the country had a right to rely. Many of us who are free traders in the abstract would not for a moment advocate free trade as a practical working proposition to-day. Nor would we venture a prediction as to when, if ever, it may be a practical issue. Many of us who believe that a tariff should be levied no higher than the highest revenue producing point must concede that an immediate reduction to such a point might in some cases be so radical as to create undue disturbance of business and inflict unnecessary hardships. We must not, if we would retain the confidence of the people, overreach ourselves and overdo our program. We must not go beyond the promises of our platform.

Whether or not it was intended to do so, the pending bill carries a certain amount of protection; and I see no harm in being perfectly frank to say so. I shall be equally frank in saying that I favor it. Let me not be understood to indorse the principle of protection as advocated by the Republican Party. If we had the power to write a retroactive tariff, going back for 40 years, if we could do over again what has been done in the past 40 years, I believe we could develop an economic structure more just and sound than has been developed under Republican rule. But that we can not do. What we can do is to make the best of the situation as it exists, and set our faces in the right direction for the future.

However unsound economically a given rate of duty may be, however unsound economically may be the business grown upon that unsound basis, we must take care in tearing down lest we do more harm than good. We may justly denounce a tariff as a robber tariff, and yet it does not follow that all who have established in business under a robber tariff are themselves robbers. It is probably true that a false economic system can not be remedied without some damage to some individuals at some time. I hope we may have the courage to face this situation squarely, and not to flinch because someone is getting hurt a little by a reasonable tariff revision. But, on the other hand, let us be spared from doing any unnecessary damage; let us proceed with the caution which our platform pledges us to observe.

When I say that I believe our platform is conservative I do not use the word in contradistinction to progressive. The Democratic Party is essentially progressive, and there is no place in it for reactionaries or standpatters. The Democratic Party, as I understand it from reading the Democratic platform, is conservative as distinguished from radical. It is conservative in the sense that the spirit of the American people is conservative, and, at the same time, progressive as the American people are progressive. In short, it is in tune with the spirit and desires of the whole people, as the elections of last autumn bore witness. And I believe if we continue in conservative progress along the lines we have already commenced a greater victory awaits us in 1912.

It has been said that the duties proposed in this bill are necessary to maintain the revenues of the Government, and I do not question the sincerity of those Democrats who think that this is true. For myself, however, I do not care to place my vote on that ground. I see no reason to question the substantial accuracy of the prediction made by the minority of the Ways and Means Committee that the surplus in the National Treasury of ordinary receipts over ordinary expenditures for the year ending on the last day of this month will be more than $36,000,000; in fact, I believe that estimate is conservative. Schedule K, which produced a revenue of about $42,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, will fall several millions short of that amount during the present fiscal year. And I believe that the surplus of ordinary receipts over ordinary expenditures during this fiscal year will exceed the total amount of revenue from Schedule K; in other words, we could disregard all revenue from Schedule K during the current year and still show a surplus from the ordinary operations of the Government. Should the Government receipts continue at the present rate, the problem will be rather to reduce them than to maintain them. Some loss in revenue there will doubtless be if the Canadian reciprocity and the "free-list" bills become law, and the amount of such loss is necessarily somewhat uncertain now. If these measures should reduce the revenues by $15,000,000—and the reduction will probably not be greater than that—a large surplus will still remain.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to show my own reasons for supporting this bill. It is sufficient for me that it is a fulfillment of the Democratic platform. I am glad that all my Democratic brethren are going to vote together on this measure, even though some of them may like the bill because it carries some protection, others may favor it because they believe it a revenue necessity, and still others may make some concessions in their views and vote for the bill because it is a party measure.

The speeches made in opposition to our party action on this schedule seem rather to emphasize the wisdom of our course. We have been criticized for acting together, and we have been criticized for thinking independently and disagreeing about the exact extent to which the reduction in this schedule should be carried. We have been criticized because the proposed cut is said to be too great, and we have been criticized for not making a greater cut. I have come to the conclusion that the greatest trouble with the bill from the Republican point of view is that it is too nearly right.

I have listened with particular interest to the remarks of the Ohio member of the Ways and Means Committee, who signed the report of the minority of that committee. I was especially interested to hear him say that he was concerned not only with the interests of his own district, but with the interests of the entire State. I was interested because I, too, have at heart the interests of the State of Ohio and have given some thought to the effect which the proposed legislation might have upon the State.

The minority report on the pending bill contains a criticism of the majority members of the committee for their alleged lack of care and study in preparation of the bill, and my distinguished colleague [Mr. LONGWORTH] who signed that report, emphasized that criticism in his remarks and further criticized the report of the majority members of his committee as being based on insufficient authority, saying:

> I have reason to know from information acquired from this report that its authors have no facts based on information more recent than that of 50 years ago.

What led him to think that they did not have the information contained in the hearings before the Payne committee he did not say, but later in his remarks he did say:

> It has been as difficult to extract any information, any authoritative, up-to-date, modern information from any speech or any presentation of this subject made by any gentleman of the Ways and Means Committee as it is from the report.

Having been thus generous in his criticism of the Democratic position, he could reasonably have been expected in the course of his remarks to present us with at least a little authoritative, up-to-date, and modern information. I listened attentively to secure it, and I have since carefully studied his remarks as they appeared in the RECORD. Being particularly interested in the effect of this bill upon the State of Ohio, I turn first to such up-to-date information as I can find in the gentleman's remarks upon that subject:

> I can not forget that while my district is mostly in the city of Cincinnati, it is also in the State of Ohio. I can not forget that while there are very few farmers in my district, there are thousands upon thousands in the State of Ohio, and that they are there, as they are everywhere else, the backbone and sinew of the community. I am not willing to ask for reasonable protection for an industry in my district and deny to the farmers in Ohio outside of my district reasonable protection on their most important product.

On their most important product! As an example of authoritative, up-to-date information the gentleman tells us that wool is the most important product of the Ohio farmer.

The information to which I shall refer is no more up to date than the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1910, but I believe it will be sufficient to refute that statement. The total amount of wool, washed and unwashed, produced in Ohio in 1910 is given as 17,000,000 pounds, which yielded something over 8,000,000 pounds of scoured wool, having a total value on October 1, 1910, of $4,554,550.

Surely the Ohio farmer is in sore straits if this is his most important product. But I find some encouragement respecting the farming situation in Ohio on other pages of the Statistical Abstract. For example, I find that the Ohio farmer in 1910 produced 144,000,000 bushels of corn, which, at 49 cents a bushel, had a value of over $70,000,000. In that year Ohio produced nearly 4,000,000 tons of hay, having a farm value of over $49,000,000; 31,500,000 bushels of wheat, valued at $28,000,000; 15,000,000 bushels of potatoes, valued at $7,600,000; 75,000,000 pounds of tobacco, valued at $6,400,000. As to eggs, I have not found the figures for 1910, but I presume I shall do no violence to the argument if I show the number of eggs produced in 1900, as there is no doubt that the production in 1910 would be greater. In 1900 Ohio produced some 91,000,000 dozens of eggs, which, at the prices prevailing in 1910, would have sold for more than $21,000,000, or about four and one-half times the value of the scoured wool produced in the State in that year.

I quote again from the distinguished gentleman's remarks:

> The sheep-raising industry is practically the farming industry of Ohio. Practically every farm in the State has sheep, and the profits of that farm at the end of the year are made up largely, in the majority of cases, of the result of the sale of the wool of those sheep; the wool, mind you, not the mutton. It is the wool that makes the Ohio farmer prosperous. If you have a reasonable duty on wool, the Ohio farmer is prosperous.

Mr. Chairman, the investment in farm property in Ohio, including land, improvements, buildings, implements, machinery, and live stock, in the year 1900, as given in the Statistical Abstract, was nearly $1,200,000,000. I believe it is not less than that amount, certainly not substantially less, to-day. Now the total value of all the wool produced in the State in 1910, after it had been scoured, was about $4,500,000. Had it cost absolutely nothing to produce this wool, had it cost nothing to feed, shelter, and tend the sheep, had it cost nothing to shear them and to scour 17,000,000 pounds of wool, had this whole $4,500,000 been net clear profit, without a penny of expense or cost, it would amount to less than two-fifths of 1 per cent of the money invested in farm property in the State. But as the gentleman tells us that the cost of producing wool is so great that the farmer will be unable to continue in the business if his protection is reduced, as he tells us that woolgrowing is done on a very close margin, a precariously close margin, it must follow that only a small part of the $4,500,000 production represents profit to the farmer, and I leave it to the distinguished gentleman from Cincinnati to tell us just what infinitesimal fraction of 1 per cent the Ohio farmer's profit on wool bears to his total investment. Can the gentleman look these figures in the face and tell us that the sheep-raising industry is practically the farming industry of Ohio? Can he tell us that the profits of the farm are made up largely of the result of the sale of the wool—"the wool, mind you, not the mutton"?

When I recall that the sponsor for this extraordinary statement is none other than the author of the Tariff Commission bill, that he is literally thirsting for information which he believes no one but a tariff commission can collect, I wonder whether he and his colleagues on the Republican side who are so concerned about Ohio's wool production will make as intelligent use of the information to be gathered by the Tariff Board as they are making of the information already laid before them by the Department of Commerce and Labor.

To return to the question of the probable effect of the proposed law on the farmers of Ohio, let us endeavor to make an estimate in dollars and cents of what the loss to them is likely to be by reason of this law. In as much as the present price of wool in Ohio is approximately the same as the present price in London, it is difficult for me to see that the Ohio farmer can lose anything. But as it is argued that the agitation attendant upon the reduction of the schedule has already resulted in a lower price of wool, let us concede for the sake of argument that there will be a drop in the price of wool in Ohio exactly commensurate with the reduction in duty. I will say in passing that if we are really interested in maintaining prices for the Ohio woolgrowers, we would do well to inquire into the charges that there is some understanding among wool buyers affecting the prices to be paid for wool. But that question is not under discussion now, and we are now to assume that the price of wool in Ohio will go down to the full extent of the tariff reduction.

A dollar's worth of wool imported during the fiscal year 1910 paid under the Payne law an average duty of 44.31 per cent. Let us assume then that an amount of wool which would sell in England or elsewhere for the equivalent of $1 would sell in Ohio for $1.45. It is proposed in the pending bill to substitute a 20 per cent straight ad valorem duty for the duty levied under existing law, which has resulted in an ad valorem equivalent of about 45 per cent. Therefore, we are to assume that the amount of wool which has heretofore sold for $1.45 will now sell for $1.20, a reduction of about 17 per cent. If we apply a 17 per cent reduction to the value of the wool production in Ohio we will know the worst. We will then know the total loss which Ohio woolgrowers will theoretically be called upon to sustain. Practically it is not likely that they will lose anything like so much. Applying then the assumed percentage of reduction to the total value of wool produced in Ohio in 1910, we find that had the pending bill been law in that year, and had it had the greatest effect on prices which it possibly could have, and which it probably never will have, the Ohio crop in 1910 would have been worth $775,000 less than the price which it actually brought.

This is the grand total of the possible theoretical calamity which could befall the Ohio farmer. It is one-fifteenth of 1 per cent of his invested capital. If, as the gentleman assumes, there are 71,000 owners of sheep in Ohio, the greatest average loss that each of them could be called upon to bear by reason of this reduction is about $11 a year. Eleven dollars a year is the largest conceivable average gross loss to the individual sheep raiser, and if he has a family of five to clothe he may, perhaps, buy as many as five woolen suits in a year, and possibly some woolen underclothing and blankets. On these purchases under the operation of the proposed law he will recoup at least a large portion of what he may lose in the price of his wool. The ultimate burden on the farmer will be absolutely inconsiderable.

But as the gentleman has refused to have his vision limited to the confines of his own district and has stated his purpose to take a view as broad as the State itself, so he must also refuse to limit his vision to any one class within the State. He must consider not only the growers of wool, but all of the inhabitants of the great State of Ohio.

The average per capita consumption of raw wool or its equivalent throughout the United States for the year 1910 was 7.11 pounds. The average for the State of Ohio, with its climate more rigorous than that of many of the States of the Union, must be very considerably above that average, so that if we assume a per capita consumption of wool in Ohio of 7.11 pounds we shall certainly be well within the truth. The State had last year 4,767,121 inhabitants, and must have consumed not less than 33,894,230 pounds of raw wool or its equivalent—just about twice the State's production. In the face of these figures will anyone say that it is to the interest of the State of Ohio that this tax should be maintained on raw wool?

Let me pause to comment on the significance of these figures. Those Representatives from Ohio who oppose a reduction in the tariff on wool can not justify it on the ground that it is for the benefit of the State as a whole, because they must, if they are candid, admit that the production of wool within the State is totally inadequate to supply the needs of the State. Looked at from the point of view of the State of Ohio, the proposition is simply one that requires the citizens of the State to bear a tax of $1,700,000 in order that one-half that amount may go in profits to the sheep raisers. This refers only to unmanufactured wool. If this bill works out as we have reason to hope, the tax which will be lifted from the shoulders of the Ohio consumer will be much greater than $1,700,000, because it will give us a freer market for the purchase of finished woolen products. As to whether any attempt will be made by dealers and middlemen to gobble up the advantages intended to be afforded to the consumers by reduction in the tariff is a totally different question and one which it is not appropriate to go into at this time. I can only say briefly that if competition is free among the dealers the consumer will get the benefits which he should get; and if there is any restraint of competition we have laws to stop it.

Now, let us examine what sort of authority is sufficient for a Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee to base an opinion on. Let us see what is the reliance of the gentleman who thinks he sees such woeful want of care and scientific accuracy among his Democratic colleagues. I must add that what I am about to quote is the sole and only authority cited in the whole entertaining speech of the gentleman who insists that the Ways and Means Committee has based its action on insufficient authority. Now let me quote:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote some real authority, an authority that, I think, will be admitted by gentlemen on that side of the House to be high. I do not believe that there is a man among you who pretends to be a student of political economy that has not read Taussig's History of the Tariff. This work and his other works on the tariff are the standard in this country, and particularly the standard on the tariff from the free-trade point of view. Prof. Taussig has been for years at the head of the department of political economy at Harvard. He has been for years the leader of the free-trade school of thought in this country—at least one of the great leaders. He appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and testified, and among other things he spoke of wool; and I will read in full what he said about wool. I had hoped that all of the gentlemen on that side of the House had read the hearings on this subject.
> I doubt whether they have heard Prof. Taussig, their great authority. He said: "I will take up the case of wool. I do not believe there is any sound, economic reason for maintaining a duty on wool; I think, in principle, wool should be admitted free. At the same time the woolen industry of the United States and woolgrowing in the United States has adapted itself to so great a degree to the present duty on wool that I should not now advocate the immediate sweeping away of the duties on wool. I think the wise policy in regard to the duty on wool is to reduce the duties on clothing and clothing wool from their present rate, and I think no substantial harm will be done to the woolgrowers of the United States, not enough certainly to offset the advantage to the community, by reducing those duties one-third, from 12 to 8 cents a pound."
> That was in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on the Payne bill in 1909. Note that he says it would be unwise policy to disturb too greatly either the woolgrowing or the wool manufacturing industries at once, while he still believes ultimately in free trade. Note that he says:
> "I think no substantial harm will come to the woolgrowers of the United States, not enough certainly to offset the advantage to the community, by reducing these duties one-third."
>
> But, gentlemen, you have reduced them two-thirds. I am speaking of authority. Upon what authority can you state that you will not destroy the woolgrowing industry of Ohio, my State, and other States similarly situated, when you reduce the duty two-thirds, and when this great authority on the tariff, from the free-trade standpoint, says that it would be unwise to reduce those duties more than one-third?
>
> I think the country ought to understand that even from your free-trade point of view you are not proceeding according to the judgment of authority in this country. That is the reason I use the word.
> Now, I ask the question, Upon what authority have the majority of the Ways and Means Committee founded their action upon this bill? What new information have they acquired? A careful reading of this report shows that there is nothing new or up to date in it.

At that point he proceeded to admit that certain tables of figures in the committee's report were up to date, but the passage I have just quoted is the meat of his discourse on "real authority." The date of Prof. Taussig's testimony before the Ways and Means Committee was given by the gentleman as 1909, which is approximately correct, the exact date being December 15, 1908. The testimony, therefore, is just 2½ years old, but is, nevertheless, substantially as good as new, as it has not been necessary for Prof. Taussig to change his position during that time; and that is more than can be said for the Republican Party, which at that time had not yet conceived the necessity of a report from a board of experts in order to revise the tariff. My criticism as to the use of this authority is not based on the fact that the testimony was given two and one-half years ago; my criticism is that the testimony was totally misconstrued and misinterpreted and that it never was intended to convey the inference which the gentleman seeks to draw from it. And in support of this criticism I desire here to quote from a letter which I have just received from Prof. Taussig, which not only upsets the notion that he considered as dangerous a reduction greater than one-third in the duty on raw wool, but also throws light on the opinion of that thorough economic scholar concerning the bill now before the House, a copy of which I sent him.

In the letter I have just received Prof. Taussig says:

> When I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee in 1908 I tried to suggest changes that might be made by a protectionist body really desirous of making some "downward revision;" in other words, minimum changes. I have always been of opinion that, as a matter of principle and of long-run expediency, wool should be duty free; I have repeatedly said so; I still believe so. But the process by which free wool is to be reached may be a slow and gradual one or a quick and abrupt one. What process shall be adopted must be a matter of political expediency and more or less of compromise. There is much to be said in favor of gradual changes and of a tentative measure such as the Democrats now propose.
> Whether a reduction of the wool duty not by one-third but by one-half will work "substantial harm" to the woolgrowers no one can predict with confidence. You have got to face the fact that a reduction in duty, if it is really to accomplish anything, must hurt some one to some degree. The difference between an 8-cent and a 6-cent duty (20 per cent ad valorem=about 6 cents) does not seem to me likely to be of much consequence. Neither would be "ruinous" to the woolgrowers. The Territory ranchers would raise a tremendous howl—they will do so, anyhow, on the slightest provocation—and some of them would very likely shift gradually from sheep to cattle. But woolgrowing would not cease. The farmers proper (in the agricultural districts proper) maintain sheep, if at all, as a by-product, and probably would not be much affected one way or the other—I say, much affected. Unless the price of wool falls, and with it that of woolens, the change means nothing.

On the whole, the Democratic bill seems to me to deserve support, whether or no one would have drafted this precise sort of measure if one had the say about it. My own feeling is that carpet wool (as now defined in the tariff) might have been admitted free and the duties on carpets lowered correspondingly. If any general duty is to remain on wool, there is a great deal to be said in favor of an ad valorem rate, especially one so moderate as 20 per cent, which offers comparatively no inducement for undervaluation. The ad valorem rates on woolens are in this regard—undervaluation—dangerous; but that is the case with the existing high duties, and the situation is made better by the pending bill, not worse.

Mr. Chairman, is not this expression from Prof. Taussig a complete answer to the question of my colleague from Ohio when he asks upon what authority we can state that this measure will not destroy the wool-growing industry of Ohio? Can he not find his answer in the words of the great economist whom he quoted and whom he so highly honors? To repeat these words, "the farmers proper—in the agricultural districts proper—maintain sheep, if at all, as a by-product, and probably would not be much affected one way or the other." In the next sentence Prof. Taussig frankly says what I think we all agree with, that the price of wool would probably be somewhat reduced by the proposed reduction in the duty. The point is that the loss to the farmers of Ohio would be very small, as Prof. Taussig states, and as the figures which I have heretofore submitted conclusively show.

Let it be remembered not only that Prof. Taussig is a highly qualified expert who has devoted his life to the study of economics, but that he looks at these questions from an absolutely disinterested point of view, with no ax to grind and no purpose to serve other than to express his best judgment for the best interests of the country. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we may well feel a sense of gratification in knowing that our party platform, and our action in carrying out that platform, are broadly and substantially indorsed by an economist of Prof. Taussig's character and attainments. I have not in the course of this debate heard an equally great authority cited in opposition to this bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, having discussed the question of scientific, economic authority to sustain this bill, I must refer to that still higher authority, the will of the American people. When the people voted last November they voted for a reduction of tariff duties, and there is no doubt but that they had Schedule K very clearly in mind. There is no doubt but that their votes were cast for a material reduction in this schedule.

The Republican Party once pledged itself to a substantial downward revision of the tariff and violated its pledge, violated it notably in the very schedule which we are now considering, and because of this repudiation of its plain duty the party was itself repudiated at the polls. Let the Republican Members in this body pick flaws in this measure if they will; let them seek, if they will, a still further postponement of this revision, contrary to their own platform and to the known and expressed wish of the people. It is enough for me to know that this bill is a performance of a Democratic promise, a promise which the American people have commissioned us to carry out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is entitled "A bill to reduce the tariff on wool and the manufactures of wool." The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Before the bill was introduced the Democratic caucus placed upon the measure the seal of its approval. The proposed bill is to all intents and purposes a distinctive Democratic tariff measure, and is fashioned in harmony with the policy of the Democratic Party on the tariff question. The bill will have practically a solid vote in its support from the Democratic membership of this House. Being a party measure, approved by the Democratic caucus, no amendments will be allowed. All effort to perfect, amend, or modify the bill will be futile. Discussion of the measure, with any expectation of thereby changing any of its provisions, will be time and effort wasted. So far as this bill is concerned the House of Representatives, in a formal and perfunctory way, will merely register the will of the Democratic caucus.

As this measure is typical of other Democratic tariff bills that will be passed by this House during the present and subsequent sessions of this Congress, we may with profit give careful study to the same, with a view to pointing out its defects and calling attention to the dangerous provisions therein. This is indeed the duty of the Republican minority. We have no power to control the legislation. The responsibility of legislation rests upon our political adversaries. We do have the responsibility of critics, and we should discharge this duty faithfully and patriotically, with a view of thereby serving our constituents and our countrymen.

After somewhat careful consideration I have concluded that I can not support the bill, and I desire to express some of the reasons for the conclusion I have reached.

PRESENT TARIFF ON WOOL.

Under the present law the tariff on wool is as follows: Wool of first class, 11 cents per pound; wool, second class, 12 cents per pound; wool of third class, 4 cents per pound, if valued at 12 or less than 12 cents per pound, and 7 cents per pound if valued at more than 12 cents per pound. These rates are specific—that is, so much per pound. But these specific rates are equivalent to an average ad valorem rate of 44.31 per cent. Under the proposed bill no specific rates are applied to wool, but, in lieu thereof, ad valorem rates have been substituted. On wool of the first class the rate is 20 per cent ad valorem. This is equivalent to a specific rate of from 4 to 5 cents per pound. So that this bill provides for a reduction in the rate of duty upon wool of the first class from 11 cents per pound to from 4 to 5 cents per pound; or, in other words, a reduction from 44.31 per cent ad valorem to 20 per cent ad valorem. To express the same thing in still different language, the proposed bill makes a reduction in the tariff upon wool of about 60 per cent. A corresponding reduction is of course made on all articles manufactured out of wool.

Before going into the discussion further, I desire to say that my chief objection to this measure is the reduction made on raw wool. I believe some modification should be made in the present tariff on the manufactures of wool. I have no objections to changes in the present rates of duty that apply to the products of our woolen mills. But I can not consent to do a great injury and injustice to the woolgrowers for the sake of securing a more scientific and appropriate rate upon cloth and all kinds of fabrics manufactured from wool. Rates should be reduced when they are excessive, unreasonable, or inequitable; but when an existing rate is fair, reasonable, and competitive, as the present rates on raw wool are admitted to be, any reduction in the rate is unfair and unjust and will inflict great financial loss upon all persons engaged in the industry involved.

VIOLATES PLATFORM PLEDGES.

The Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee, in its very lengthy report upon this bill, quotes that portion of the Democratic platform of 1908 which relates to the tariff. Apparently the able gentlemen who prepared this report believe that the provisions of the proposed bill follow the declarations in the Democratic platform. But as I read and construe this platform the pledges therein made are clearly violated, and the principles enunciated therein are wholly ignored.

The Democratic platform referring to the tariff, in part, is as follows:

> Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list. * * * And gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

In this language two positive declarations are made, and there is one clearly implied promise. There is a plain statement that all trust-controlled products should be placed on the free list. There is a positive declaration that in other schedules "gradual reduction" should be made to restore the tariff to a revenue basis. Finally, there is a clearly implied promise or pledge that there should be no reduction in rates when the existing tariff is upon a revenue basis.

As I read the proposed bill, it clearly violates these three plain and positive declarations in the Democratic platform of 1908.

TRUST-CONTROLLED PRODUCTS.

It has been asserted in this debate that the American Woolen Co. is a trust. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, opened the debate on this bill in a very able and carefully prepared speech. On revenue measures he speaks for his party in this House. During this opening speech he used this language:

> There is nobody in this country who does not know that the American Woolen Co. to-day fixes the price of woolen goods; that it is a monopoly; that it is a trust.

If it be true that the American Woolen Co. "fixes the prices of woolen goods; that it is a monopoly; that it is a trust," then the Democratic platform demands that the products of this trust shall be placed upon the free list. But the proposed bill, indorsed by the Democratic caucus, and presented here as a Democratic revenue measure, places an average ad valorem duty on the products of the American Woolen Co. of 42½ per cent. Is not this a plain violation of the declaration in the Democratic platform that trust-controlled products should be placed on the free list? Have we not the right to conclude that the declaration in the Democratic platform that all trust-controlled products should be placed on the free list is to become a dead letter? Certainly, in the proposed bill no attempt has been made to follow it.

NOT GRADUAL REDUCTION.

But this Democratic platform calls for "gradual reduction" to restore the tariff to a revenue basis. The proposed bill in the rates on wool does not follow this declaration. Changing the rate on wool from 11 cents per pound to 4 or 5 cents a pound is not gradual reduction. Reducing the tariff on wool from 44.31 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem is not gradual reduction. We are all perfectly familiar with the meaning of the word "gradual." The people understood what it meant. The farmers, the woolgrowers of the country know what gradual reduction means. But that there may be no question about it, I quote the following definition of the word "gradual" from the Standard Dictionary:

1. Proceeding or advancing by steps or degrees; moving, changing, or varying slowly and regularly; slow. 2. Divided into degrees; marked by regular graduations; graduated.

In view of this definition no one will claim that a reduction of the tariff on wool from 11 cents to 5 cents per pound, or a reduction from 44.31 per cent ad valorem to 20 per cent ad valorem is a gradual reduction. In other words, a reduction of 60 per cent on wool, as provided in this bill, is not a reduction "proceeding by steps or degrees"; it is not changing the tariff on wool "slowly and regularly"; and is not therefore a gradual reduction, as demanded and promised to the people in the Democratic platform. On the contrary, the proposed change in the tariff on wool is sudden, sweeping, and radical. Is it right to obtain power, under promise to take the tariff wall down by degrees—to take a layer of stones off at a time—and then when you come to exercise that power to proceed forthwith, in effect, to entirely obliterate the wall? Whatever dissatisfaction there may be with Republican revision in 1909, on the ground that the reduction in some cases were not sufficient, I feel sure there is no sentiment among the people in favor of any sweeping, radical reduction of the tariff at the present time. And the farmers of this country will, at the first opportunity, punish the political party that promised gradual reduction, but gave the country radical reduction in the tariff rates.

REDUCTION BELOW REVENUE BASIS.

There is another particular in which the Democratic platform is not being carried out in good faith. The gradual reduction was to be made to a revenue basis. This clearly implied that rates now on a revenue basis would not be disturbed. The declared policy was to reduce all rates to a revenue basis. This is equivalent to saying there should be no change in rates that were admittedly already on a revenue basis. But the present tariff on wool is conceded to be upon a revenue basis. In 1910 the duty collected on wool amounted to more than $21,000,000. The Ways and Means Committee, in their report on this bill, estimates that under the proposed rate of 20 per cent ad valorem the duties collected will amount to but $13,000,000 annually. In other words, the rate on wool by this bill is reduced below a revenue basis—that is, below the point where the greatest revenue can be collected. Under the platform declaration there can be no authority, justification, or adequate excuse for making a reduction of 60 per cent in the tariff on wool when the present rate on the article is upon a revenue basis. The woolgrowers may justly and truthfully say to the leaders of the Democratic Party, your reductions in the tariff on wool have not been gradual, as you promised all reductions should be, and you have violated the plain implication in your platform that you would not disturb or change rates which under the present law are admitted to be upon a revenue basis.

TEST PROPOSED.

To test the willingness of the Democratic Members of this House to carry out their party's platform declarations, I shall, at the proper time, offer the following amendment to this bill:

That when, under existing law or any law hereafter enacted, it shall be finally determined by any court, board, commission, or other competent legal authority having jurisdiction in such cases, that any article or articles hereinafter mentioned enter into competition with trust-controlled products, then the said article or articles when so imported shall thereafter be admitted free of duty, until such time as said article or articles shall cease to enter into competition with trust-controlled products.

But if this bill goes through without any change, as decreed by the Democratic caucus, my amendment will not be adopted, and my philanthropic effort to aid the Democratic Party in redeeming the pledges in its platform will be in vain.

FREE TRADE WILL NOT DESTROY THE TRUSTS.

Personally I do not believe that "the tariff is the mother of trusts," or that you can regulate, control, or prevent trusts by tariff legislation. We would still have trusts even with every article manufactured in the United States on the free list. This is demonstrated, first, by the fact that in England, where free trade prevails, except as to noncompeting articles, the trusts abound as extensively as in this country; and, second, we have trusts in articles upon which there are no tariff duties levied. But in amending and modifying our present tariff law we may well take in consideration what, if any, competition we have at home in the article or articles upon which protective duties are levied.

In adjusting our tariff we should have all information possible as to whether the articles in the bill under consideration are largely the product of so-called trusts. Every honest industry needs encouragement and protection. As a Republican I believe we may give this encouragement and this protection in levying our tariff duties. But at the same time we should exercise the greatest of care that we do not by our tariff legislation aid those who, in violation of the law, have combined to suppress home competition.

TARIFF LEGISLATION PREMATURE.

General tariff legislation at this session of Congress is premature. We are proceeding without adequate information. There is a widespread sentiment throughout the country in favor of a more scientific method in tariff legislation. This has given rise to the almost universal demand for a permanent tariff commission, to furnish Congress the best information obtainable. While the bill creating a tariff commission failed to become a law at the last session of Congress, by reason of a filibuster conducted by Democratic Members of this House, Congress did, however, authorize the President to appoint a Tariff Board, that may do the same work as the commission. The board was appointed, organized, and its work has been in progress for some time. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars were appropriated for its support, and all told about 80 persons are now at work under this board. The work of this board is to make a thorough study of the cost of production in the United States and in foreign countries and furnish to Congress all the facts, information, and knowledge obtainable that will guide Members of Congress in the preparation of a tariff law, that will afford reasonable and adequate protection to all American industries, and yet will not be excessive, in such a way as to impose unjust and unnecessary taxation or serve as a shield to monopoly.

But the Democratic majority in this House, without waiting for the information that the Tariff Board will furnish for use at the regular session of Congress which convenes next December, have prepared this bill, and the caucus has decreed that it must be passed without modification or amendment. This is certainly very unwise action. In legislation, as in all other things, nothing contributes so much toward valuable results as comprehensive information and thorough knowledge. The consideration of this measure is premature. It would be much wiser to wait a few months, get the report from the Tariff Board—we will then have more accurate and trustworthy information as to the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and will be better prepared to fix rates of duties that will more nearly equalize the difference between the cost of production in the United States and other nations.

PROPOSED LAW BASED UPON WRONG THEORY.

In the preparation of this bill no consideration was given to the producers of the United States. Capital and labor were left to their fate. The manufacturers, the men employed in woolen factories, and the men on farms and ranches engaged in producing wool and mutton were wholly ignored. But one object was kept in view—the raising of revenue. If the bill affords protection to any industry it is unavoidable, unintentional, accidental, and incidental. It is protection forced upon us by the necessity of the Government to have revenue. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in his speech opening the debate on this bill, said:

The Democratic Party does not believe that any interest in this country is entitled primarily to the fostering care of the Government of the United States.

The primary purpose from the beginning, with those who believe in the principles of the Democratic Party, is to levy these taxes for the purpose of supplying the revenue of the Government, and if any protection arises from the levying of these taxes it is a mere incident which grows out of the constitutional warrant given by the people to levy taxes at the customhouse.

We disclaim any purpose whatever of writing this bill in the interests of the manufacturers of wool or the producers of raw wool.

I can not subscribe to this doctrine. I can not vote for any measure that places the industries of our country at the mercy of foreign competition. I can not support any bill that may close our mills and factories, rob American workingmen of employment, reduce their wages, and render them unable to support themselves and their families. I can not comprehend how men whose ability and patriotism I do not question can seriously advocate that in the preparation and enactment of a great revenue measure our eyes must be blind to our own industries and our own people.

In the United States we have 914 woolen mills. They have been constructed and equipped at an expense of $415,465,000. Their annual products amount to $419,826,000. Thousands of stockholders are interested in these institutions. But when I point to our 1,000 woolen mills, to the vast capital invested therein, to the immense annual output of these factories, to the large number of individuals directly interested in their growth and prosperity, the Democratic leaders in this House calmly say: "In preparing a tariff bill we can not consider men, mills, or money; we can not foster business, stimulate production, encourage enterprise, or protect American industries; our tariff for revenue only policy must be followed, even though we close mills and factories, destroy investments, paralyze business, wreck industries, and bring financial ruin to thousands of American citizens."

One hundred and sixty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty-nine persons are employed in our woolen mills. With those dependent upon them, they represent 500,000 individuals, all depending upon the profitable operation of these mills for food, clothing, shelter, and other necessaries of life. They receive annually in wages $79,214,000. But the advocates of the tariff for revenue only policy, apparently indifferent as to the fate of these men, declare: "In enacting revenue laws we have no concern about food and clothing and shelter and education for the men employed in our woolen mills."

Nearly 700,000 farmers and ranchmen are interested in the wool industry. They own 57,216,000 sheep. They sell every year 328,110,749 pounds of wool. The annual wool crop is worth $72,439,838. Every year about 20,000,000 sheep are slaughtered for mutton. In wool and mutton our flocks yield to our farmers annually an income of over $100,000,000.

But when I call attention to the vast importance of the wool industry, to the money invested therein, to the large number of farmers interested, to the certainty that, if the proposed reduction in the tariff on wool shall be made, great loss to our farmers is inevitable, you close your eyes, turn a deaf ear, and leave the farmers to their fate.

The present tariff on wool is not excessive. The present rates are competitive. Foreign woolgrowers pay existing tariff rates and compete in our markets with American woolgrowers. If under present rates they can compete, under the proposed rates they can destroy. Nearly one-half of the wool consumed in the United States comes from abroad. Last year 263,939,584 pounds of foreign wool were imported into the United States. There is no woolgrowers' trust. Our farmers are all in free competition. Even with present tariff rates woolgrowing and sheep raising are not sufficiently profitable to induce the average farmer to engage in the business. In the campaign of 1910 the main complaint was that the rates on manufactured products were too high; that the "special interests" dictated the tariff law of 1909. We heard nothing about excessive rates on wool and other farm products. Still, at the very inception of Democratic tariff revision a bill is proposed to reduce the tariff on wool 60 per cent. The farmers are hit first. The great corporations in a measure are able to care for themselves. They may form an international trust and avoid foreign competition. The farmers can not do this. Instead of first giving attention to the tariff levied on products of our giant corporations, a great agricultural industry is threatened with destruction.

I can not voluntarily be a party to this destruction of a great American industry, which, with the men employed and those dependent upon them, directly affects at least 3,000,000 American citizens. If the tariff on woolen and worsted goods is too high, reduce it. I will vote for any reasonable reduction that does not mean annihilation to American industries, but if to get this reduction on woolen and worsted goods you demand that I shall vote to confiscate the property of the woolgrowers of the country, I refuse to follow you. In order to make reasonable reduction in the tariff on manufactures of wool it is not necessary that you inflict irreparable injury upon the woolgrowers. It is admitted that under the provisions of this bill there will be a large increase in the importations of foreign wool, that the farmer will get less for his wool, and the value of sheep will be depreciated. As an offset to this loss the farmer is promised cheaper clothing. The American farmer will not be deceived by such promises. Two years ago the farmers were told that for placing hides on the free list they would buy boots and shoes and harness cheaper. Hides went on the free list, but boots and shoes and harness and leather have not gone down. So when American flocks have been destroyed, when the woolgrowing in the United States has ceased as an industry because it has become unprofitable, the 100,000,000 people in the United States will still be paying the same high prices for woolen goods.

THE PRESENT AND THE PROPOSED LAW—A CONTRAST.

Much has been said in criticism of our present tariff law. However just some of this criticism may have been, time and experience have largely vindicated the measure. It has served admirably the two great purposes for which it was enacted: To provide adequate revenue for the Government and afford reasonable protection to American industries and American labor. Nearly two years have passed since it became a law. What are the conditions in our country to-day? Business is good. Times are prosperous. Commerce is flourishing. Industrial establishments are busy. Labor is employed. Good wages are paid. Never before in our history were our citizens better fed, better clothed, or better housed. Never before were they enjoying superior advantages, greater opportunities, or more substantial blessings.

This Republican tariff act did not close a single factory, destroy a single industry, or bankrupt a single individual. It did not reduce the wage or earning capacity of a single American laboring man. It did not disturb business, reduce production, or retard enterprise. It did not depress trade, discourage commerce, or frighten investors. It made no bankrupts, paupers, tramps, or beggars. It did not depreciate the value of property or multiply debts and mortgages. Under it the farmer has received good prices for his products, and the value of his land has been enhanced. The merchant has extended his trade, increased his stock of goods, and augmented his profits. There is something for every man to do at remunerative wages, and there is a demand for every product at living prices. Our country, throughout its length and breadth abounds in peace, plenty, and prosperity. Fortunate will it be for our country if this happy state of affairs shall continue for an indefinite period.

But, alas! if the present revenue law shall be revised schedule by schedule on the lines followed in the pending bill, no one can fully comprehend the evil consequences that will follow. To change our tariff system from a protective basis to a tariff-for-revenue-only basis is revolutionary and will require an absolute readjustment and rebuilding of our industrial fabric. It means that we must pass through a long period of doubt, uncertainty, and gloom. Prices, values, rents, incomes, wages, salaries, earnings, profits—all must change to correspond to the new order of things. And as the tariff goes downward to a revenue basis, to a point where the greatest revenue will be secured with the lowest rate of duty, so everything else will travel the descending scale. As the tariff wall shall be obliterated and importations of foreign products shall increase, so our standard of living and our standard of prices and values must necessarily seek the level prevailing in foreign countries. A revolution in our tariff from a protective system to a tariff-for-revenue-only system will put in motion a train of misfortunes that will travel along every avenue of trade, commerce, and business in our country, touch every profession, avocation, and calling in life, and visit with its unwelcome shadow every household, fireside, and home in the land. To what level we will be brought no one can foretell. No one can accurately estimate the force and fury of the wave of disaster that is bound to follow a revolution in our tariff system. Those who are conducting this revolution in our tariff system are playing with fire. Persist in this policy and a conflagration is inevitable. There will be reduction in wages, depreciation in the value of farms and farm products, shrinkage in rents and values of real estate in cities, contraction in trade and commerce, and disturbance, depression, disaster, devastation, and ruin in all lines of business. The evil consequences that will follow are beyond the realm of human comprehension—too great to be grasped by the greatest intellect, too complex and far-reaching to be described by the most eloquent tongue, and too awful to be conceived by the most vivid imagination.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES].

Mr. AMES. Mr. Chairman, I am a manufacturer at home, as my people before me have been for some generations. We manufacture a variety of products, and my family connections are largly interested in the manufacture of cotton and woolens. I feel the necessity, in this debate on this proposed Democratic wool bill, of giving some of the facts concerning the manufacturer, that they may be a matter of record. I realize that with the inflamed public mind on this subject—inflamed by the demagogue, the muckraker, and the misinformed reformer—that for a decent man to tell the facts as he knows them to be in the woolen and worsted industry makes him liable to either ridicule for being a fool or to scorn for being a liar; but the facts I have gathered, and now present to you, have been gathered in my own representative district, which includes the cities of Lowell and Lawrence—I think the largest manufacturing district in the country, where there are many woolen and worsted and cotton mills. I will confine myself to-night to the woolen question, having gone personally into a number of these woolen and worsted mills, having consulted their pay rolls and their cost sheets. I have verified their wage scale, their processes, what they pay for their machinery, and their accounts. The figures that I give can be verified. They are fundamental; they are susceptible of proof or disproof.

Now, a word about the wool "barons" and the Woolen Trust—and we have just had here a fair example of the misconception and misinformation by a Member of the House concerning the so-called Woolen Trust, the same misinformation that is shared by the public. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] spoke to-night, a few minutes ago, and in the course of his remarks quoted from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who spoke yesterday. I read from the reporter's notes of the speech of Mr. CULLOP, delivered to-night. Speaking about the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], he said:

The gentleman from Massachusetts said this: "The amount of capital in the year 1909 invested in the woolen and worsted manufacturing industry was $419,000,000. The capital at that time of the American Woolen Co. consisted of $35,000,000 of preferred stock and $29,000,000 of common stock. It was the customary method of organizing corporations of that kind 10 years ago. The estimated value of the plants was submitted to the auditors and a report was made as to the condition of those plants and their value. It was estimated at that time that the plants and machinery and real estate, and other things that went to make up the property of that company, had a value of $25,000,000."

That ends the quotation from the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Indiana then went on with utter disregard of facts, and this is a fair example of the public misconception and misunderstanding of the very simplest thing. The gentleman from Indiana said:

Ten years ago worth $25,000,000; issued $20,000,000 of preferred stock and $29,000,000 of common stock, and out of that little capital to-day it owns a property valued at $419,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, that $419,000,000, which he states is the value of the American Woolen Co., is the total product of the woolen and worsted industry of the entire United States, comprising our 900 establishments, and has no more connection with the property value of the American Woolen Co. than has the total product of the cotton industry [applause on the Republican side]; and yet you gentlemen on the Democratic side applauded that display of misconception of the facts.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMES. Just for a moment.

Mr. MONDELL. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts call to the attention of the gentleman from Indiana the error that he had fallen into?

Mr. AMES. I tried to repeatedly, but the gentleman, sure of his facts, would not permit an interruption. Now, a word about the wool barons.

Mr. Frederick Ayer, of Lowell, owned the Washington Mills, in Lawrence; Mr. Charles Fletcher, of Providence, the Providence Worsted Mills; and Mr. James Phillips, of Fitchburg, two mills in Fitchburg. Mr. Wood, the son-in-law of Mr. Ayer and treasurer of the Washington Mills, brought these gentlemen together, and they, with some of Mr. Fletcher's friends, put their mills into the new company, which they called the American Woolen Co. They then issued stock, and with the proceeds bought up a number of bankrupt woolen mills, or mills whose owners were glad to sell out because their business was unsuccessful. The original capital issued in preferred stock was $20,000,000, which was not excessive. Since then there have been two issues of $10,000,000 paid for in cash, in order to build mills which gave more employment to labor and to provide more working capital. Where is the harm in this? Is it criminal to employ labor? Is it illegal to sell stock in order to build mills?

In the relatively short time remaining, I shall hurry from one fact to another. In my district are the largest mills of the American Woolen Co. Its head, Mr. Wood, has repeatedly thrown his influence against me in caucus, and between us little political love has been lost, but he is entitled to his due. How was the American Woolen Co. formed? Their property was audited at the time of organization, and its value was set at $25,000,000, but that does not begin to represent the value of the investment sunk into those plants and never taken out. It is a fact that very few of those engaged in the woolen industries charge off depreciation; and, indeed, I do not know of one, except the American Woolen Co., which charges against the cost of manufacture an interest charge on the money invested, and they have to do it because they have preferred stock that brings in the investment as a charge against the net profits in the sales. So I have no fear as to the final result.

Now, gentlemen of the Democratic Party, inform yourselves and let the country know the truth, because I believe that this wave of misinformation and misstatement can not be overwhelming. I realize that people, even in high positions, have characterized the schedule as "indefensible," but from the point of view of truth, justice, and fact it is most unfortunate. I think they were misinformed, and I think they were hasty in their speech.

The protection afforded by schedule K to the wage earners of America may be high in spots, and the Committee on Ways and Means will bear me out in this statement, that I think I was one of the very few, if not the only Member of Congress, who went before the Committee on Ways and Means with technical and expert testimony in an effort to reduce the rates in the wool schedule. With the treasurer of one of the biggest woolen mills and of one of the biggest worsted mills in my district, I went before the committee and showed how the woolen schedule could be reduced without injury to the manufacturer. We felt that the rates of duty under the Dingley law were higher than were needed, and we knew that the country demanded a lowering of those rates. They gave us full hearings, and were quite impressed with the value and sincerity of the testimony, and I believe they considered the proposed reduction favorably. But when they took it up on the other side of the Capitol, the person in charge of the bill there—I will not mention names; you all know who he is—would not consent to any reduction on raw wool or any change, and as a compromise the woolen schedule was left as it was.

We are going to have a tariff report from the Tariff Board by December 1. Wait until you get some information, gentlemen, that you know is not partisan—and we all have to assume that they are honest men on that Tariff Board—and you will find that Members of Congress, representing districts in which there are large woolen and worsted mills, will come down here and vote for any decent bill within a thousand miles of the truth in order to stop this agitation and permit the already much-disturbed condition of business in this industry to straighten itself out. There is nothing worse for any manufacturing business than this constant agitation of a question which vitally affects values. The woolen business is practically in a state of coma, because the buyers of cloth do not dare to make purchases until they have assured themselves that values have become stable.

Now, to go a bit further. We talk about the difference in labor here and abroad. That is not all. Here are some figures estimated for furnishing a plant capable of producing 6,000 pounds per week of 2-ply No. 44 worsted yarn—that is, drawing and spinning, and so forth. In England, for that machinery, they pay $31,000 and we pay $48,000. Nine-tenths of the worsted-spinning machinery is imported because there is only one manufacturer of that class of machinery in this country. There is not a mill supply that goes into the manufacture of cloth that does not stand us higher than it does the manufacturers in England, because here everything is protected.

Why, I ask, should you pick out the woolen industry, or any other particular industry, to deal it a blow such as you here propose?

This cloth was made in a mill in my district. There are 3½ yards in a suit. This cloth was sold by the mill that made it for $1.50 a yard, and the net profit to that mill on that cloth is 14 cents, and that is all that mill got out of it. The cloth that the average suit of clothes of the average man is made out of is sold by the mill at $1 a yard, and 3½ yards of that is $3.50, and the net profit to the mills making that cloth is a fraction over 10 cents per suit of clothes. Your robber barons——

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. How much wool is in the suit?

Mr. AMES. It is all wool.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. But how many pounds of wool?

Mr. AMES. I can not say offhand.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Not more than 3 pounds—4 pounds.

Mr. AMES. Oh, I will give you the percentage of material in the United States, which is 52 per cent of the cost of the goods; and the gentleman can figure out the value of wool himself. I would like to give the information, but I have only got a few minutes and I have many things to go into. Now, I will take another example. Here are some facts concerning a prosperous mill in Massachusetts, and what I tell you of this mill is true of 99 out of 100 mills engaged in this industry.

The sales of that mill for 10 years from January 1, 1901, to December 30, 1910, were, total, $13,301,422.62. The profit was $416,335.18, or 3⅛ per cent, and that did not count in a charge for interest on the money invested in the plant and in the business. And yet you gentlemen on the Democratic side have denounced the wool barons and the worsted barons, and you are now planning to ruin the industry regardless of facts. If their money had been placed in a savings bank these manufacturers could have sat idly by and twirled their thumbs and got more out of their investment than by working every day in the year and lying awake nights thinking how to cheapen some process.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

Mr. AMES. I have but 25 minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman did not hear all the debate between myself and Mr. WEEKS on that question.

Mr. AMES. I only read the gentleman's statement. With his original investment safely placed in a savings bank the manufacturer could sit at home and twirl his thumbs. But what does he do? He takes chances in buying the wool perhaps not at the lowest price. If he makes an error in purchasing his wool, he is likely to lose more than he could possibly earn. He struggles to get the patterns and samples that will attract the public eye, and thereby keep his mill running. He takes the chance of some customer failing to pay or canceling his orders, and a hundred other chances and kinds of worry and hard work, in the end to earn only 3⅛ per cent on his sales. I will go further than that. With one exception, and I will make that the American Woolen Co., because they claim they earn 9 per cent, while other manufacturers doubt that very much. But let that go. You can not name outside of that company, you can not find one engaged in the woolen or worsted business if they allow 4 per cent interest on their actual cash investment in their business, you can not find a so-called wool baron or worsted baron that earns 3⅛ per cent per annum.

Now, there is nothing wicked about an industry that earns as little as that. You can with equal grace, logic, and reason say all the savings banks were money barons and ought to be cleaned out. This small margin of profit has all been brought about by home competition, competition that has forced the price of goods down almost to the price in other markets, and without the additional competition of the cheaper labor of foreign lands. There is no margin to go upon or economy that can be effected, and there are only two ways in which the price of the cloth can be reduced at the mill, and those are to cheapen wool or reduce the wages of labor. There is nothing left to the manufacturer. In the mills at home in the last 17 years they raised wages three times voluntarily—10 per cent in 1895, another 10 per cent in 1905, and another 10 per cent in 1910. You ask where the protection goes. It goes to the operatives, of course; and two years ago the hours of labor under the Massachusetts laws were changed from 58 to 56 hours per week, and that is equivalent to an increase of 3.57 per cent, because wages were not altered, so that the increase amounted in the last 17 years to 37½ per cent, which you will find by compounding the figures just given. And this year the hours of labor have again been reduced from 56 to 54 per week.

Now, a word as to wages, and I commend to you, gentlemen, and to everyone else who has any interest whatever in being guided by facts, the report of the Bureau of Manufactures of the Department of Commerce and Labor, by W. A. Graham Clark, in 1908. I was not willing to take it on faith. So I got some of my relatives who were studying the woolen business in England to bring over to me an account of the wages paid to operatives in the combing, drawing, and spinning industries, those that I knew particularly about, and then I compared them with these, and found that they were very accurate, and I have written in the book here the wages we pay our people in our mills at home. Let me give you a few instances. We pay a gill tenter $7.26, in England she gets $3.04; a spindle gill tenter, $7.22, while in England they get $3.04; drawing-box tenters we pay $14.44, while they pay $6.08; for finishers we pay $28.88, they pay $11.68.

Now, I will read the figures alternately for overlookers, takers-off, twisters, sweepers, and so forth. While we pay totals of $55, they pay $23; while we pay $8, they pay $2.92; while we pay $66, they pay $28; for a jobber lad we pay $8.12, and they pay $2.67; and so on down the list.

Now, if you will average those up you will find we pay 230 per cent more than the wages paid in England for the same work, and I think you will agree that English paid labor is as well paid as any on the Continent. In fact, if my memory does not play me a trick, the British Parliament sent over a committee within a year and a half to investigate the wages in America and the cost of living, and what they report back is 230 per cent increase in this country over the English wage, and they also report that the cost of living is only 152 per cent greater over here. And if any of you will go over into the English textile country and stop in one of those cities you will be awakened in the morning when the bell rings at an early hour by the clack, clack of wooden shoes on the street. You will look out of the window and you will see women going by with shawls over their heads. But in our district in Massachusetts you will see the women come to the mills in nice hats, gloves, shoes, and dresses. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You can talk as much as you please about protecting the "barons" and the woolen manufacturers. My friends, there is only one way we can meet this competition from abroad if you open the doors so it may come in, and that will be to reduce wages. We can not get our wool any cheaper. If this bill goes through, you will put a duty of 20 per cent on it, which, by the way, I do not think is enough to protect the sheep raiser. We do not want to reduce the wages of our people. They are fairly well paid; they are happy, prosperous, and contented, and if we started in to reduce wages they would strike; they would not work, and the mills would close. And then what would happen? One advantage of having an industry established in a country is that it takes so many men and women out of the labor market and reduces the competition among the laboring people by just so much. Now, suppose by the reduction which is proposed, which, God knows, I hope will not become a law as it is, that the woolen industry, with its 500,000 employees, be crippled, and that number of working people have to seek some other channel for a livelihood, some other occupation? They will go into other industries. There will be labor competition and wages will be reduced everywhere.

I want to call your attention to another thing. I want to be quite candid with you. In spite of the fact that we Republican Members of Congress got for Massachusetts in the last revision all the protection there was, the people at home came within a few hundred votes of turning us all out; and the reason for that was this: It is 15 or 16 or more years ago since they knew what free trade or reduced protection meant. A man does not vote until he is 21. The average expectation of life of a man having reached 21 years is somewhere around 42 years, and so 31 years would represent the age of the average voter; and the average voter represents the average state of mind in the country. And it is the average state of mind of the country that is the voice of the people; and to that we must bow, right or wrong. It is now more than a decade since they have had an experience of insufficient protection, and they have got to have their experience. As sure as the sun shines, if you take the protection off of cloth and manufactured goods that is necessary to equal the cost of the difference of labor here and abroad, these people in the course of a year or two will learn for themselves the folly, shortsightedness, and the impossibility of government by the Democracy, and they will come hurrying back to the Republican Party. So I have no fear as to the ultimate result, but I fear for my people and the hunger and want and privation they will have to pass through before they learn the full value of your false promises and your impracticable theories.

And so it follows that with each decade we have a new generation of voters; also that each generation of voters is unwilling to go by the experience of a preceding generation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] made a speech here the other day. I am sorry I was not present. I can not find his speech in the RECORD. I do not want to do him an injustice, but I have been told that the purport of his speech was to show that American labor was much more efficient than foreign labor and produced more per capita. I hope I am not overstating the case, as he put it. If so, I wish some one would correct me.

Now, I do not believe the gentleman, if he be a manufacturer, even intimated that his remarks should be applied to the woolen and cotton business, because they can not apply in the slightest degree. And to prove that, let me give you some statistics here.

In the woolen-mill industry in Massachusetts there are 38,801 men and women, of whom 5,038 have native fathers; 33,763 have foreign fathers; so that 87 per cent are of foreign parentage or foreign born. You can get all these figures from page 69 to page 114 of the census of Massachusetts for 1905. There are no later statistics available. The Census Bureau this morning had nothing to date. From what countries do these people come? Ireland, 10,761; Canada (English), 693; Canada (French), 5,743; England, 4,433; Germany, 2,029; Scandinavia, 312; Italy, 1,952; Poland, 1,529; Russia, 1,514; Austria, 952; Scotland, 1,108; and smaller numbers from other countries.

In the cotton business there were 89,467 men and women employed in my State. Of these 7,119 had native fathers, while 82,338 were of foreign parentage. In other words, 92 per cent were foreign born or of foreign parentage, distributed as follows:

Ireland, 16,657; Canada (English), 1,110; Canada (French), 27,185; England, 13,494; Germany, 2,289; Scandinavia, 238; Scotland, 1,695; and smaller numbers from other lands.

Is it not absurd to suppose that crossing the water changes a man's efficiency? These figures that I gave you in regard to wages in the mills at home and in England mean wages for men working at the same machines, running at the same speed, producing exactly the same amount of goods. Do not these facts completely controvert Mr. REDFIELD's proposition?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, will my friend allow me just a moment?

Mr. AMES. Surely. I hope the gentleman will not make it too long.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How do you account for the fact that the value of the product of American labor is double that of the product of any foreign labor?

Mr. AMES. I do not know that it is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And in many instances the product sells for three or four times as much as the product of foreign labor. How do you explain that?

Mr. AMES. I will answer by stating that in these industries—the cotton and woolen—American labor produces exactly the same amount as foreign labor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As a general proposition, the product of American labor is twice as valuable as the product of foreign labor. We are just as much in favor of taking care of the American laborer as you are, but the difficulty about the question is the profit to the American manufacturer.

Mr. AMES. That may be, but I have no proof of it, and I have to take the gentleman's say so for it. I have not yet seen it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do you not know that as a fact?

Mr. AMES. No; I do not know that it is a fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, it is a fact, to my certain knowledge, that the value of the product of American labor in any given line will average twice that of the product of labor in any country in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] has expired.

Mr. AMES. May I have three minutes more to explain just where the cost goes?

Mr. MANN. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. AMES. You want to know why American-made goods cost so much. One reason is this: There is a class of merchants known as tailors to the trade or book houses, because they send out all over the country sample books of cloth, from which suits of clothes may be selected by the customer. Chicago is a center for this business, and it amounts to a good many millions a year. You will see their advertisements in every magazine. We sell them goods at a dollar a yard. They insist they can not make any profit if they pay more than a dollar a yard. Then they send these books around, and a few measurements are taken, and people order clothes in that way. I will tell you how it works.

A treasurer of one of the woolen mills in my district went into a drug store in Florida last year and saw one of these books of cloth on the counter. He recognized some of the cloth as his own make. He asked the druggist what he did with that. The druggist said, "I sell ready-made clothing." The treasurer said, "What do you get for it?" He said, "$25 a suit." The treasurer said, "How do you do it?" He said, "The customer selects his sample from the book, we take the measurement around the neck and the measure around the chest and around the waist and the length of the trousers and send that to Chicago, and the booking house sends me a suit and charges me $15 for it." He got $25, or a gross profit of $10 for filling the order. The manufacturer gets between 10 and 11 cents for making the cloth. Gentlemen, it is the cost of distribution. Of course, the manufacturers can not go into that. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AMES. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. It has been said on the floor that the American manufacturers fake the people with all sorts of shoddy clothing. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not possible to make as good fabric here as they can in England and Scotland?

Mr. AMES. Yes; if we could get the price. But we can not pay 230 per cent of the English wages and pay the tariff on the raw material, and then sell at a price that the average person would be willing to pay for it.

Mr. FOCHT. I was wondering why they imported that cloth.

Mr. AMES. Because they are able and willing to pay $40 or $80 for a suit of clothes.

If some gentleman had asked me if we could make as poor a suit as can be made in England, I should answer that it was very doubtful, because by the report for the year 1907 the latest I happen to have available—but any report would do as well—there was imported into England 113,000,000 pounds of rags from other countries and into the United States in the same year 115,000. Now, I am not abusing rags and shoddy, for they are very serviceable materials for making cheap, heavy garments, like overcoats; but if anyone thinks that they use only pure wool in England he had better take a trip through the Batley and Dewsbury districts and see for himself, or I would refer him to the report of Mr. Clark.

In the preliminary report of the Census Bureau the value of products of woolen and worsted goods is given as $419,826,000 and the salaries and wages as $79,214,000. From the above figures many people, including the present Democratic chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, have erroneously concluded that labor is less than 19 per cent of the value of the product. That this assumption is utterly without justification is shown by the following:

The census report includes in "products"—	Value.
Yarns	$94,539,000
Tops, slubbing, etc	8,110,000
Noils and waste	12,528,000
Other products	3,485,000
Total	118,662,000

All the above-mentioned articles appear again under the heading of "Material," as reported by the maker of cloth, since he buys these articles and adds further value to them by labor and expense. If every mill carried on all the processes of manufacture, there would be one total labor cost and one ultimate value of product, but in the instances of subdivision of product, as reported above, the finished product of one branch of the industry becomes the material of the next, so that it is obvious that any comparison of relative percentages of labor and material are incorrect and misleading.

The following table shows clearly how there may be a small percentage of labor cost where the industry is subdivided, but a much greater percentage of labor cost where the relation between total labor and the ultimate value of products is considered:

Process.	Material.	Waste.	Labor.	Expense.	Product.	Per cent labor to product.
Manufacturer of tops	$0.45	$0.05	$0.03	$0.02	$0.55	5½
Manufacturer of yarn	.55	.03	.10	.07	.75	13
Manufacturer of cloth	.75	.07	.18	.20	1.20	15

Total labor	$0.31
Ultimate value of product	$1.20
Total labor to total product—per cent	26

I quote the following from page 307 of the Bulletin of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers:

These totals, as seems to be unavoidable in all census returns, contain a very considerable element of duplication, owing to the subdivision of the industry, in consequence of which the productions of one department become the raw material for the next step in the manufacturing process and the statistics for the minor processes become part and parcel both in the cost and value of the final result.

These complications seriously affect, in fact render impossible, an exact comparison of some of the most important points in manufacture. The "Cost of materials used" and the "Value of products" are greatly enhanced, while the items "Capital engaged" and "Wages paid" are not correspondingly increased, so that calculations involving the relations of the second group of items to the first are misleading and of no value.

The costs of production in the earlier processes properly belong in the item of total cost, but the cost of yarn, etc., purchased is a doubtful element. A portion of it no doubt belongs in the general account and clearly also a part of it does not. Again, in the total value a similar difficulty appears. The values of the product of the earlier processes, if carried on independently, appear in the total value twice at least—first as yarn produced, and again in the cloth manufactured. If every establishment carried on all the processes of manufacture, as formerly was the case, such difficulties would not exist, for the cost of the raw material—wool, for instance—would appear in the value of the product only in the cloth, and not, perhaps, as tops, again as yarn, and finally as finished cloth.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I now yield a half hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reference has just been made to the cost of labor in the United States for woolen operatives. The average wage paid to the woolen operatives, according to the census prior to the last, was $364 per year. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In approaching a brief discussion of the very important question which is now before this legislative body of the Government, I do so with a full knowledge of the responsibility which should characterize the conscientious effort of every Member of the House. Listening to the debates on this schedule, I am impressed with the sincerity of those who have entered into this discussion. There seems to be an honest difference of opinion between the two great parties upon the question of taxation, one contending that the greatest revenue can be collected by a high protective duty and the other alleging that sufficient revenue can be raised for the economical administration of the affairs of the Government by the imposition of a tariff for revenue only. The issue is well defined. There is no mistaking the battle ground. But whatever the issue, the people of the United States by their ballots at the polls in 1910 declared that there should be an abandonment of the principle of high protective duties and commissioned the majority party of this House to make a reduction in the present high duties. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The duty, then, is not as to whether it is right or wrong to make a reduction, but as to the degree that such reduction should be made, keeping in mind the welfare of all the people of our great country.

TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY A CARDINAL PRINCIPLE OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The Constitution of the United States has plainly declared what the taxing power is and the use to which the moneys realized from such taxation shall be put. It declares that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

This can mean only one thing, and that one thing is laying a duty, a tariff, for the purpose of raising revenue for the administration of the affairs of the Government. The defense and maintenance of this fundamental provision of taxation in the Constitution of the United States always has been, and will remain to be, a cardinal principle of the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It has never wavered from this position; and, moreover, it has always insisted, and still insists, that only such revenue shall be raised as is necessary for the economical administration of the affairs of the Government. This always has been its creed. The greatest battle of ballots that was ever fought and won in the interests of the people of the United States and in behalf of an economical administration of governmental affairs was the battle fought and won by the great Samuel J. Tilden. [Applause on the Democratic side.] How well that great master of political economy and civic affairs wrote into his platform this declaration:

Reform is necessary in the sum and modes of Federal taxation, to the end that capital may be set free from distrust and labor lightly burdened. We denounce the present tariff, levied upon nearly 4,000 articles, as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sale of American manufactures at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture, an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all customhouse taxation shall be only for revenue.

And how true to present conditions! All over this fair land there are cries of fraud; in every port arrests of the "get rich quick" are made for smuggling; dishonest officials are being called to the bar of justice; and the records of the bankruptcy courts show how mercilessly the honest merchants have been trodden under the feet of trusts and combinations. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And this very day, within the shadow of this Capitol, committees of this House are investigating the business conduct of mammoth corporations, the outgrowth of this iniquitous tariff, "the masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense." [Applause on the Democratic side.] And so down to and including its last great convention, in 1908, the Democratic Party has stood for a tariff for revenue only. At that convention it declared:

We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties. Material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessaries of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home; and that gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

The report of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee on this wool schedule, understood by every man, woman, and child in the United States who is fortunate enough to have clothes, is sufficient evidence that we propose to redeem that pledge and keep the faith. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

PREELECTION PROMISES OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY VIOLATED.

On the other hand, the Republican Party since its birth has declared for the very highest rate of protective duties, and with each succeeding tariff bill proposed and enacted by that party when in power increased the rate, while the importation of almost all classes of goods became prohibitive. However, prior to the meeting of the Republican national convention of 1908, the leaders of that party recognized that the people demanded a change from the higher rates of duty to lower rates of duty and wrote into its platform the promise for a revision of the tariff in the following language:

The Republican Party declares unequivocally for the revision of the tariff at a special session of Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President.

That the people understood that revision to mean a downward revision is unquestionable. President Taft on numerous occasions prior to the election of 1908, and, in fact, prior to his nomination in that year, unequivocally declared in favor of the revision of the tariff downward.

In a speech he delivered at Kansas City February 10, 1908, he said:

In the 10 years which have elapsed since the enactment of the Dingley tariff the conditions have so changed as to make a number of schedules under the tariff too high.

In his speech of acceptance of July 28, 1908, he said:

The tariff in a number of schedules exceeds the difference between the cost of production of such articles abroad and at home, including a reasonable profit to the American producer.

And further:

The excess over that difference serves no useful purpose, but offers a temptation to those who have monopolized the production in this country to profit by the excessive rates.

Later, in a speech delivered at Cincinnati September 22, 1908, Mr. Taft said:

The Dingley tariff has served the country well, but its rates have become generally excessive. They have become excessive because conditions have changed since its passage in 1897.

And after referring to the fact that some of the rates are probably too low, due also to the change of conditions, he next said: "But, on the whole, the tariff should be lowered." And to clinch his statement, and as a further pledge to the people that there would be a revision downward of the tariff, in this same speech, delivered at his home in Cincinnati, he said:

I wish there to be no doubt in respect to the revision of the tariff. I am a tariff revisionist, and I have been one since the question has been mooted.

Two days later in Milwaukee, on September 24, 1908, in answer to a speech that had there been delivered by Mr. Bryan, he said:

I can say that our party is pledged to a genuine revision, and as a temporary head of that party and President of the United States, if it be successful in November, I expect to use all the influence that I have by calling immediately a special session, and by recommendation to Congress to secure a genuine and honest revision. * * *

It is my judgment that a revision of the tariff, in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform, will be on the whole a substantial revision downward, though there probably will be a few exceptions in this regard.

Again, in a speech delivered at Des Moines, Iowa, September 25, 1908, Mr. Taft said:

It is my judgment, as it is that of many Republicans, that there are many schedules of that tariff in which the rates are too excessive, and there are a few in which the rates are not sufficient to fill the measure of conservative protection.

And later, on the same occasion and in that connection, he declared:

As the temporary leader of the party, I do not hesitate to say, with all the emphasis of which I am capable, that if the party is given the mandate of power in November it will perform its promises in good faith.

As a result of these preelection promises and pledges Mr. Taft was elected President of the United States. His first official utterance was his inaugural address, March 4, 1909, and then and there Mr. Taft emphasized his previous utterances in these words:

It is thought that there has been such a change in conditions since the enactment of the Dingley Act, drafted on a similarly protective principle, that the measure of the tariff above stated will permit the reduction of rates in certain schedules and will require the advancement of few, if any.

The history of tariff legislation shows that a special and extraordinary session of Congress was called soon thereafter for the purpose of considering the tariff question. At that session the Dingley tariff bill was revised, but instead of being revised downward, as the Republican Party and its standard bearer had pledged, it was revised upward. And although President Taft had pledged the people that there should be an honest revision of the tariff downward, the President signed the bill containing this same Schedule K, the woolen schedule, which proved itself to be the most iniquitous, extravagant, unjustifiable one that has ever been placed upon the statutes of the United States. The Republican authorities admitted this, and President Taft on one occasion declared:

The woolen schedule is indefensible, and I propose to say so.

Later on, in a public address in New York, February 12, 1910, he is officially reported as saying:

The one substantial defect in compliance with the promise of the platform was the failure to reduce woolens.

UNDERWOOD BILL FAIR AND EQUITABLE.

Without going into detail to show that there was no revision at all in the Payne-Aldrich bill by Schedule K, it is agreed by all authorities that the rates in this schedule are too high and go beyond any difference in the cost of production, including protection of profits to the manufacturer. As I have already stated, the people at the polls, last November, demanded a revision of Schedule K. The action of the majority of the members of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting this bill with these substantial reductions, not intended in any manner to injure the trade of the country or to affect the business interests of the country, is abundantly justified. It would be highly foolish and grossly unjust for the Democratic Party, at this time or at any other time, to make radical reductions in the tariff affecting great industries and which might possibly result in business disaster.

The Democratic Party is pledged to conserve the interests of the American people, regardless of class, and the wise provisions and schedules of duties contained in this particular schedule is sufficient evidence to prove the sincerity and honesty of purpose of that great party.

To my mind, and I believe to the mind of the average layman, the most noteworthy and most commendable feature of this bill, outside of the general reduction in the duties on wool and woolen manufactures, is the change from the compound, specific, and compensatory duties to the ad valorem system. This bill, when it becomes a law, will be fair and equitable to all interests under all circumstances. The primary object of any tariff law should be the collection of internal revenue with the least possible burden on the people. Specific duties have always proved themselves unjust and have invariably worked injury upon the consumer. As was admirably said in the report of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee:

The great evil of specific duties is that they always and inevitably bear more heavily upon the poor than upon the rich. When goods are taxed according to kind, pound, weight, measure, or the like, without regard to value, the coarser and cheaper grades necessarily must pay as much as the finer and more expensive grades, and the taxes fall with most crushing force on those least able to pay.

The abolition of the specific duties removes all opportunity for concealing and disguising the various tricks and manipulations for the private profit of favored rings and groups and prevents frauds and juggling of weights. In other words, it places the collection of duties upon a thorough business basis and makes easy of computation and calculation the amount due the Government.

REDUCTION IN WOOL SCHEDULE DECREASES COST OF LIVING.

The final result of this bill will be the reduction of cost to the consumer and the increase in imports of the articles that he uses. It means that the cheaper class of goods worn by the greater mass of our people, upon which there was a tax equivalent to 144 per cent ad valorem as against a tax of 96 per cent ad valorem on more expensive goods, will be imported into this country, thus giving cheaper cost to those least able to pay. The truth is that the tariff duties upon cheaper grades of woolen goods heretofore were prohibitive and that these goods, the average value of which was 35 cents per pound, were only imported to an amount of 6,016 pounds, yielding $2,111 of duties, while of the more expensive goods, the average value of which was $1.07 per pound, were imported to an amount of 5,433,182 pounds, yielding $5,827,777 in duties.

The people of our country asked for relief. You know and they know that clothing and blankets are a necessity of life. You know and they know that the Payne-Aldrich bill imposed additional burdens upon the consumers of the country. You know and they know that the Payne-Aldrich bill increased the cost of living in every home in the land, and the only thing that saved the Republican Party in the campaign of 1908 was, as I have stated before, its express promise to relieve the American people of this burden. The people trusted the Republican Party and believed it would fulfill its platform pledges and campaign promises. When it failed, they turned to the Democratic Party and asked that they be relieved. The Democratic Party is willing to relieve them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has reduced the duty on raw wool from an ad valorem duty of 44.31 per cent to 20 per cent. On wool wastes, rags, and so forth, and materials that are worked up with the raw wool into fabrics, from an ad valorem duty of 38.96 per cent to 20 per cent. On combed wools and combed wool or tops and other woolen hair which have been advanced by processes of manufacture, from 105.19 per cent ad valorem to 25 per cent, the duty was reduced. In fact, in some of the cheaper articles in this group the ad valorem equivalent of the duties collected ranges from 112.86 to 252.21 per cent. On cloths and knit fabrics, wholly or in part of wool, 97.11 per cent to 40 per cent. Yarns were reduced from 82.38 per cent to 30 per cent.

One of the most beneficial paragraphs in this whole bill is the reduction of the duties on blankets and flannels, and it will be observed that the least duty is placed upon the cheaper grades and kinds that are used by those least able to bear the burden of taxation. This section, which should and will receive the hearty indorsement of every American, reads:

On blankets and flannels, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That on flannels composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at above 50 cents per pound, the duty shall be 45 per cent ad valorem.

The duty under the Payne-Aldrich bill is 95.57 per cent.

On women's and children's dress goods the burden is again lifted, and instead of an ad valorem rate of 102.85 per cent this bill proposes the rate of 45 per cent ad valorem. On clothing ready made and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls, instead of the high rate of 81.31 per cent ad valorem exacted by the Payne-Aldrich bill this bill proposes an ad valorem rate of 45 per cent. And so we might run through the entire bill in order to show that on those articles most used by the common people the committee has endeavored to reduce the duties in order to relieve the burdens upon the people and at the same time to raise a revenue sufficient to carry on the affairs of the Government economically administered.

According to statistics, the actual imports and duties under the Payne-Aldrich schedule in the fiscal year 1910, the average ad valorem equivalent of the duty collected that year on manufactures of wool was 90.10 per cent. Under this bill on the estimated imports the duties for 1910 and the ad valorem equivalent would be 42.55 per cent. This proposed schedule is giving to more than 92,000,000 American people a relief from the burdens of taxation, and it is within the power of the toiler to clothe his wife and little ones against the snows and storms of winter without taking the bread out of their mouths.

PRESENT AMERICAN CONDITIONS NOT DIFFERENT FROM ENGLISH CONDITIONS IN 1820.

In this connection it might be well to observe that with the growth of the population there has been more than a corresponding growth of tax collecting. In 1897 the tax paid directly to the National Government amounted to about $3.85 per capita, and in 1910 it amounted to about $7.35 per capita—almost twice as much. In 1910 the tariff tax alone paid directly to the Government amounted to about $3.55 per capita. Add to this the State tax, the county tax, the municipal tax, and the school tax, and we might then exclaim, as did Sir Sydney Smith in 1820, that the American pays—

Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon everything that is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes on everything on earth, and the waters under the earth; on everything that comes from abroad or is grown at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite, and the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge, and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the poor man's salt, and the rich man's spice; at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay.

The schoolboy whips his taxed top, the beardless youth manages his taxed horse with a taxed bridle on a taxed road, and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine which has paid 7 per cent into a spoon that has paid 15 per cent, flings himself back upon his chintz bed which has paid 22 per cent, and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of £100 for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel, his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble, and he is then gathered to his fathers, to be taxed no more.

[Laughter and applause.]

INDUSTRIES OF WESTMORELAND-BUTLER CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT.

When I addressed the House on the Canadian reciprocity question I stated that the district which I represent is probably one of the most important in the United States. I stated also that my home county, Westmoreland, was bounded on the west by the district which the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has the honor to represent. No county in the State of Pennsylvania contains more diversified industrial and productive interests than does Westmoreland. It is a part of the great bituminous coal field, and is, in fact, second in point of production of bituminous coal in the State of Pennsylvania. Within the confines of my district there are located at least two of the largest plants of the United States Steel Co., the Page Woven Wire Fence Co., the American Window Glass Co., the Pennsylvania Rubber Co., and the Kelly & Jones Co., manufacturer of iron and brass castings, employing upward of 2,000 men in a town adjacent to the one in which I live. In this same county there is located probably the largest tin-plate factory in the United States and one of the largest aluminum factories in the world. We have brick factories, paper mills, iron foundries, breweries, distilleries, drug manufacturing establishments, swing factories, and pit-wagon factories—in short, about everything that is used in the mechanical and industrial world except textile goods.

In Butler County there is located one of the works of the great Standard Car Co., employing 5,000 operatives and more, and a large plate-glass works, and in addition Butler County is one of the greatest oil-producing territories in the North. As I have previously stated on the floor of the House, it is a large agricultural district, probably more than one-third of its inhabitants being engaged in the honorable, honest, and staid pursuit of farming, and everywhere is seen the fructifying results of honest toil.

FOREIGN LABOR PREFERRED TO AMERICAN LABOR.

The claim is made that the enactment of this bill into law will reduce the price paid to the wage earner. It has always been the contention of the Republican Party that a high protective duty increased and maintained the price of wages that the laborer receives. The advocates of a high protective tariff have always contended, and are contending, that the American laborer is the highest-paid laborer in the world. Whether he is the highest-paid laborer in the world, God knows it is low enough. Pennsylvania has always been pointed to as the citadel of high protection and the home of the best-paid wage earner on the earth.

Let us see whether or not Pennsylvania, with its diversified and protected interests, pays such wages as the advocate of high protection can boast of.

I take as my authority the annual report of the Secretary of Internal Affairs of Pennsylvania, prepared by the Bureau of Industrial Statistics of that department, providing data and statistics for the year ending December 31, 1909, and containing also statistical facts taken as late as April 28, 1910. It is well to remark here at this point that this report was prepared by a Republican official, it being generally admitted that the State of Pennsylvania has for its officials no other than those who belong to that political faith, and it might be added that too severe a case would not be made out against the party to which the officers owe their election.

By this report of the Bureau of Industrial Statistics of the department of Internal Affairs of Pennsylvania it is shown that in the several occupations given the total of 790,048 persons were employed. Of this number 126,293, or nearly 20 per cent, were reported with "nationality not known." The remaining 663,755 were grouped in three classes—Americans, foreigners, and negroes—and were employed as indicated in the following table of industries in the year 1909:

Industries and the number of Americans, foreigners, and negroes employed.

	Americans.	Foreigners.	Negroes.
Anthracite mining	51,567	86,105	23
Bituminous mining	54,531	107,728	1,602
Cars, car wheels, and castings	5,600	5,324	35
Cement works	3,498	5,928	14
Foundries and machine shops	5,946	1,295	124
General industries	77,550	20,217	228
Glass factories	15,401	8,057	201
Leathers (tanneries, etc.)	5,418	4,997	21
Paper mills	4,643	2,052	3
Pig-iron furnaces	4,977	8,290	407
Powder mills	533	108	3
Rolling mills	21,487	14,592	804
Steel ingots and castings	4,683	3,316	300
Steel works	22,241	20,331	1,436
Silk mills	22,936	6,014	.....
Slate quarries	3,532	1,204	14
Textile mills, Philadelphia	44,923	9,937	70
Tin plate mills	1,732	671	48
Total	342,197	316,130	5,428

Thus it will be seen that in the 18 industries marked in this table that there are 342,197 Americans employed, as against 316,130 foreigners and 5,428 negroes. It is fair to reason that since this report states that the 126,293 persons were of "nationality not known" that they are mostly foreigners, which would seem to indicate that there is more foreign labor employed in these 18 industries which I have mentioned than there are Americans. In bituminous coal mining, which prevails mostly in the district which I represent, there are 45,531 Americans employed, as against 107,728 foreigners and 1,602 negroes, or, in relative percentage, 29.4 Americans, 69.6 foreigners, and 1 per cent negroes. In the glass factories the percentage is 65.1 per cent American, 34 per cent foreigners, and nine-tenths of 1 per cent negroes. In the pig-iron furnaces the percentage is 26.4 per cent American, 60.6 per cent foreigners, and the balance negroes. In the steel works 42.2 per cent are Americans, 56.2 per cent foreigners, and the balance negroes. In these four industries, which operate chiefly in the district which I represent, there is, then, practically 43 per cent American, 55.1 per cent foreigners, and the balance negroes.

Again, I will quote from this same Republican authority wherein this Republican officeholder makes the following observation:

A particularly noteworthy feature of the tabular statement is the large number of foreigners in some of the chief occupations of the State. It will be seen that they greatly predominate in coal mining and in steel work. That fact may be the explanation, in part, of the many distressing accidents occurring so frequently in those industries, and may be the cause also of so many labor disturbances connected with them. A recent report of the United States Immigration Commission, headed by Senator DILLINGHAM, of Vermont, gives color, if not entire confirmation, to that theory. That body reports concerning the bituminous coal fields of western Pennsylvania that 75 per cent of the miners are unable to write any language, and that more than half of them were incapable of speaking or barely understanding English. It would seem that a very large proportion were from southern Europe, and were composed of elements not at all skilled in even the simplest forms of manual labor as carried on in our country. Scarcely any of these has ever worked in mines before coming to this country, and were so densely ignorant of our usages and customs pertaining to such operations that it is a source of wonder that greater disaster has not occurred in consequence of their employment in such excessive numbers. Compared with them the commission found even the poorest American superior.

All through this debate and in all pleas that are made to preserve the protective tariff there has been a constant demand that the duties which are sought by this bill to be removed be retained in order that the American laborer and American labor may be protected against foreign pauper labor, yet we have the spectacle before us in the State of Pennsylvania of a preponderance of foreign labor. The protectionist would protect woolen manufactures by a high rate of duty and declare against the just reductions in this bill, but under no circumstances would he be willing to put a protective wall around the physical structure of the American laborer. Every ship bears hundreds of foreigners who come to this country to take the place of the American in the fields and shops of the United States, and no restriction is placed upon this influx. The American laborer competes with the world, but the clothes that cover the backs of himself and his children, and the food that is placed upon his table, and the shoes that he wears upon his feet, and the hat that covers his head is laden with a duty which he must pay, and it is pretended that this is necessary to sustain the Government of the United States.

DOES HIGH PROTECTION BENEFIT AMERICAN LABOR?

Now, we have considered the American laborer in the light of when he competes with foreign labor. Let us see whether or not this American labor is protected to the degree that is contended for it. Let us see whether or not the wages that are paid him are so very much in excess of the wages that are paid labor in foreign countries. Let us see if he is growing rich and fat upon the wages that he receives for work performed in the bowels of the earth or in the heat of the furnace. Let us see if he can clothe himself and his family and lade his table with the necessaries of life, to say nothing of the luxuries of life, upon the magnificent sum which he earns. Let us see what his total bill will be after he lays down his tools at the end of the year. Let us see if he can place a balance to his credit in the savings institutions of the country, or does he place his wages to the credit of the trusts and the protected interests?

THE PENNSYLVANIA COAL MINER.

From this same report, compiled by this same Republican officeholder, I find that the total of value of coal mined in the State of Pennsylvania in the year 1909 was $132,837,578; that the average wages paid superintendents, foremen, and office men were $3,732,612. I find that the number of superintendents, foremen, and office force is 3,603. I find that the average number of people employed was 173,003, and the aggregate wages paid to these employees were $90,680,216; that the average yearly earnings of these men who mine the coal, toil all day, and expose themselves to accidents and death, who are not protected by any employers' liability act, are $524.15, making an average daily wage, according to this report, of $2. I find in this same book a statement of accidents in bituminous coal mining for the year 1909, in which it is shown that there was a total of 449 fatalities, 4,151 nonfatal, making a total of 4,600. From the same Republican authority I discover a comparative table in which it is shown that the average yearly earnings, beginning 1903 and ending 1909, are as follows:

Average yearly earnings.

1903	$540.69
1904	453.09
1905	502.58
1906	545.21
1907	603.72
1908	477.56
1909	534.15

Average daily earnings, same period.

1903	$2.31
1904	2.26
1905	2.23
1906	2.66
1907	2.25
1908	1.92
1909	2.00

It might be of interest at this time to show from this comparative table that the average days of employment was:

1903	234
1904	204
1905	261
1906	205
1907	268
1908	248
1909	279

And while in no instance was he employed more than 279 days in one year, yet we know that it was necessary for him to clothe and feed his family for 365 days in a year.

THE PENNSYLVANIA GLASS WORKER.

Again, let us quote from this same book on the subject of glass bottles and tableware market in the State of Pennsylvania for the year 1909. We find that the market value of the production was $15,615,089, while the aggregate amount of wages paid was $6,609,998, and the average yearly wage was $440.94, and an average daily wage of $1.81. From this same authority we find that the market value of the production of polished plate-glass market in Pennsylvania in the year 1909 was $8,774,240, while the aggregate amount of wages paid was $3,528,337 and the average yearly wage was $628.04, or an average wage daily of $2.14. Window glass is produced to a very large extent in the district that I represent. The market value of that production was $4,848,587, while the aggregate amount of wages paid was $2,646,757, the average yearly wage being $500.87 and the daily wage $2.01.

THE PENNSYLVANIA STEEL WORKER.

Iron and steel bridges and structural work are manufactured in my district, and from the same report I discover that the market value of the production was $20,133,208, and the aggregate amount of wages paid $3,505,295, that the average yearly earning was $464.89, and the average daily wage $1.52. How much of a family could any husband and father provide for on the yearly wage of $464.89?

THE PENNSYLVANIA LEATHER WORKER.

Much was said in a previous debate about shoe leather and the irreparable damage and vast loss that would come to the wage earner in this branch of business, yet I turn to this same report of this same Republican officeholder and find that for the year 1909 the market value of the production of shoe leather, enameled and glazed kid, in the State of Pennsylvania was $19,949,502, while the magnificent amount of wages paid in the aggregate to the wage earners was $2,194,256, making a yearly average of $475.32, and an average daily wage of $1.58. And this same Republican authority informs us that there were actually 1,850 Americans employed as against 2,071 foreigners and 3 negroes in this branch of business. Let me inquire who is protected here? The manufacturer, the American, the foreigner, or the negro?

Again, let me refer to the report of the bureau of industrial statistics of the State of Pennsylvania and see what was done in the way of manufacturing sole and harness leather in 1909. The market value of the production in that year was $37,944,268 and the aggregate amount of wages paid was $2,999,288, and the average yearly earnings was $483.33 and the average daily wage was $1.41. Who gets this great balance of more than thirty millions of dollars? Let us look into another branch of leather production, from the same report of 1909, viz, leather-belting production. The market value of this production was $1,713,701, while the aggregate value of the amount of wages paid was $173,779, and the average yearly earnings $489.57, and the average daily wage $1.58. It will thus be seen that the operative and wage earner who works by the day secures one-tenth of what he produces. The same authority informs us that the market value of leather miscellaneous production for the year 1909 was $5,651,449, that the average amount of wages paid was $380,222, that the average yearly earnings of these laborers was $438.04, while the average daily wage was only $1.41; and it might be interesting to quote that of this average daily wage of $1.41 the average to the male was $1.45 and to the female 93 cents and to the minor 74 cents.

PAUPER WAGES PAID IN HOSIERY INDUSTRY.

If time permitted me, I might go into further detail along this line, on the subject of the various industrial productions in the State of Pennsylvania. I know it would be as interesting to you as it is to me, but I will finish with just one quotation from this report from the bureau of industrial statistics of Pennsylvania, which shows the market value of a protected production and the wages paid. I refer to the hosiery production, and I presume that wool and woolens enter into this production. The market value of this production was $15,388,382 and the aggregate amount of wages paid was $4,315,546, the average yearly earning was $277.26, and the average daily wage paid was 97 cents. In this industry there were employed 2,698 males, 11,032 females, and 1,837 minors; the average yearly wage was $451.14 for the males, $250.89 for the females, and $180.44 for the minors; and the average daily wage, based upon 285 days, being the average time of operation, was, males, $1.55; females, 88 cents; and minors, 63 cents. These are the figures prepared and published in the State of Pennsylvania and reported to the governor of that great State by one of its chief officers. These figures show that the wage earner of Pennsylvania is poorly paid, and that what he does earn he spends for the support of his family.

HIGH COST OF LIVING IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Now let us turn for a few minutes and see what it costs for this wage earner to live in the State of Pennsylvania. In this same report I find that the secretary of internal affairs of Pennsylvania caused an investigation to be made of the prices of foodstuffs. These prices were ascertained on April 28, 1910, at Uniontown, the county seat of Fayette County, 38 miles from where I live, and, as the report says, these prices were found not to vary greatly from those obtained from other localities about the same period. Here are the quotations given:

Beef: Tenderloin and porterhouse, 25 cents per pound; sirloin, 22 cents per pound; pin, 25 cents per pound; round, 18 cents per pound; boiling and neck, 11 to 12½ cents per pound.

Pork: Loin and chops, 22 cents per pound; shoulder, 18 cents per pound; steak and boiling pieces not handled at this season.
Lamb: Leg, 25 cents per pound; chops, 30 cents per pound; roast (loin), 30 cents per pound.
Veal: Cutlet, 25 cents per pound; chops, 17 to 18 cents per pound; chops (loin), 20 cents per pound; roast, 17 to 18 cents per pound.
Dried beef, 35 cents per pound.
Ham: Whole, 25 cents per pound; sliced, 30 cents per pound.
Bacon: Sliced or whole, 30 cents per pound; some at 28 cents per pound.
Chickens and ducks: Live, 22 to 23 cents per pound; dressed, 28 cents per pound.
Bologna, 12 to 25 cents per pound.
Sausage: Fresh, 20 cents per pound; smoked, 12 cents per pound.
Eggs, 24 to 25 cents per dozen.
Butter, 35 to 38 cents per pound.
Lard, 20 cents per pound.
Flour: Winter wheat, 80 cents per 25-pound sack; blend, 85 cents per 25-pound sack; straight spring, 90 to 95 cents per 25-pound sack; fancy brands, $1 to $1.05 per 25-pound sack.
Potatoes, 50 cents per bushel.
Apples: Baldwins, 50 cents per peck.
Turnips: New, 5 to 8 cents per bunch.
Beets: New, 5 to 8 cents per bunch.
Cabbage: Old, 6 cents per pound; new, 10 cents per pound.
Lettuce, 20 cents per pound.
Onions: Green, 5 cents per bunch; old, 3 pounds for 25 cents.
Carrots: New, 5 cents per bunch.
Sugar, 7 cents per pound, or 16 pounds for $1.

These are the prices that are paid by the wage earners in the district which I have the honor to represent. Clothes are not mentioned, nor are shoes. Besides these, the wage earner is required to pay his rent and is required to pay for his fuel and for his light. Thus it will be seen that little remains to him at the end of the year. He can save but little. In most of the industries I have mentioned his employment tends to incapacitate him for work as he grows older. His life of activity and usefulness is not so long as that of others.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is in line with the principles of the Democratic Party and its platform and its pledges. It lifts one of the many burdens from an already tax-burdened people. It places within the means of the toiler the power to purchase with the fruits of honest labor the clothes that shield himself and family from the blasts of winter; that protect him from the heat of the furnace and the deadly fire damp of the mine. It secures to all the necessities and comforts of life without impoverishing any. When our work is done, when we have finished and passed this bill to the other end of this Capitol, the strong, patient, and long-suffering American people will raise their grateful voices and call us blessed. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the management of our side of this Hall for giving me the honored opportunity of opening and closing the case on my side. [Laughter.] There has not been anybody here on our side who has spoken from the sheep end of this question.

It was with much reluctance and no little embarrassment, Mr. Chairman, that I addressed the House upon the Canadian reciprocity agreement and the farmers' free list bill, due to the fact that I realized I stood alone in opposition to my party colleagues in the views I entertained and expressed respecting those measures, and it is with similar reluctance and embarrassment, and for a similar cause, that I approach the discussion of the pending measure to oppose its essential provisions.

I am not an absolute unbeliever in the principle and policy of caucus action, but I am unalterably opposed to the principle and propriety of a caucus determination unless it is the outcome of a full, fair, and free discussion of the merits, as well as demerits, of any measure which it is proposed to enact into a law, and after ample opportunity has been afforded individual Members to give expression to their views upon the subject. It is manifestly impossible, in the consideration of a measure of such far-reaching and vital importance to such a large class of people, to accord it the full consideration it merits within the restricted space of ten hours and a half for debate, especially when such debate is confined to the members of the committee presenting the measure for caucus action. Such a time limit and such withholding of opportunity for an intelligent understanding of the character and import of the proposed measure renders it impossible for any unbiased Member of this House conscientiously and under his oath to give his support to the resolution of the caucus.

Mr. Chairman, aside from the members of the Ways and Means Committee, previous to the assembling of the caucus, it is doubtful if there is a Member of this body who knew just what rates were to be incorporated in this bill. It was an open secret that it was the purpose of the committee to carefully withhold the information, both from the Members of the House and the public at large—a species of unjustifiable cloture policy that I confess it is utterly beyond me to sympathize with. It would be a direct reflection upon the intelligence of the constituency which elected me to membership in this body to suppose that they would believe me capable of blindly acquiescing in a decision upon such an important matter and without an opportunity for its proper consideration. What I have said should not be construed as an arraignment of the Committee on Ways and Means, for I believe they were inspired by a disposition to conserve the interests of the country and the party as well; but, I repeat, I can not give my sanction and approval to any legislation the propriety of and the necessity for which I have been unable, through lack of opportunity afforded by the caucus of my party, to understand and discuss.

Mr. Chairman, the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor raises more sheep, produces more wool, and markets more mutton than that of all the districts represented by the majority of the members of the Ways and Means Committee combined, and I think I am safe in saying that the comparison would not suffer as respects my individual district alone.

I am neither young in years nor a novice in political affairs, nor am I wholly unacquainted with the sheep industry, Mr. Chairman. To the time I was 12 years of age I had never worn an outer suit of clothes the material of which was not clipped from my father's own flock of sheep, spun into thread by the old spinning wheel, woven into cloth and made into a suit right on the farm—a home product in every sense of the word. We did not have a great number of sheep, but we had over 100 negroes and a half dozen spinning wheels and two looms, which supplied the clothing for our entire family, and as well that of our dependents, both white and black. Since I became of age there has never been a time when I have not been, either directly or indirectly, engaged in farming and stock growing pursuits, in which sheep, and all of its products, have always claimed my favoring attention.

I have recounted this fragment of personal history, Mr. Chairman, as affording possibly some justification for my having entertained a feeling of resentment toward the Committee on Ways and Means for absolutely ignoring in their deliberations one of the Members of this House who really knows something about the sheep industry, and whose judgment respecting any legislation affecting it might not have proven inconsequential. I will, however, say very frankly that that feeling of resentment was completely dissipated by a reading of the bill as submitted and agreed upon in committee, for an examination of its provisions gave ample evidence of the fact that the committee had not been in need of any information or assistance that I, as a stock grower, or anyone else familiar with that business could furnish. Very greatly to my surprise and natural disappointment, the proposed measure failed to contain one provision which in the remotest degree reflected the true interests of the sheep grower. I was equally surprised that the purpose was candidly avowed that it was the intention that the sheep industry should be abandoned; that the 766,474 sheep growers of this country should be given notice to seek other occupation, and that the $500,000,000 of capital invested in that industry should be practically confiscated. My disappointment grew out of the rebuke to the hope I had cherished, that the triumphantly reinstalled Democratic Party, to which I claim allegiance, would deserve the faith recently reimposed in it by the country and would enjoy many years of usefulness. I could not bring myself to believe that that great party, strong of purpose, rich in long years of experience, and glorious in achievement, could, in an unguarded moment, yield to any temptation. And I am reminded, in this connection, of the inglorious fate of Samson of old. I am aware, of course, that we are all familiar with the potency of the historic teachings of the Bible, and their present-day application, but lest there be some who have not profited by them, let me briefly record how Samson was beguiled.

Delilah, the beautiful degenerate, with artful witchery sought for political purposes to know the secret of his strength.

Tell me—

She said—

I pray thee, wherein thy great strength lieth, and wherewith thou mightest be bound to afflict thee.

Then said Samson, evasively, and mayhap suspiciously:

If they bind me with seven green withs that were never dried, then shall I be weak, and be as another man.

The narrative tells us how Samson facetiously invited the binding with the withes; again, with the "new ropes that never were occupied"; and anon the "weaving of the seven locks of his head with the web," from which he severally quickly released himself, until he finally lent himself to his own destruction by revealing to the importunate siren the true source of his might—his locks. "If I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak."

We can picture in vivid imagination her luring him into his fatal slumber under the soothing influence of the gentle stroke of her velvety hand, with his head resting upon her knee. She calls to the ready coconspirator, and Samson is shorn, undone, and rendered impotent. "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson," she cries; and they fall upon him and blind him and take him to prison. [Applause.]

This, Mr. Chairman, is the old familiar story of misdirected confidence and overcredulity. I can but wonder who was the fascinating and overweening Delilah who sat at the side of this sleeping giant, Democracy, and conspired to the deprivation of the source of its strength, and with it its golden opportunities. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, who is the conspirator in this case? Will the gentleman tell us? He pointed toward me.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. You are one of the Philistines. [Laughter.]

Was it the result of a disposition to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee" to the pet fetich of the Nebraskan of free raw material for everything, regardless of what it is? Were they to divide with him the sentimental prejudice against the "bleating of the lamb," of which we have read so much in his journal, the Commoner, in his characterization of the selfishness of the stock grower, or is it because they really believe what Mr. Bryan said in the issue of the paper of June 9, as follows:

A heavy tax is placed upon imported wool in the interest of the sheep owners of this country. Figures submitted by sheep men themselves disclose that there are not to exceed 22,000 persons engaged in the industry—owners, herders, shearers, and all. In view of the fact that the wool tariff adds hundreds of millions to our clothing bill, it would be a great deal cheaper for the Government to pension these men several thousand a year each.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Assuredly; and while you are at that I will find my place here.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But I want my friend to hear what I have to say.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Oh, I will hear you with pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. My friend does not mean to coincide with the views expressed by some distinguished leaders on the other side that the distinguished Nebraskan whom he refers to is still the leader of the Democratic Party, does he?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, sir, that will depend upon how you construe the resolution that was passed by the caucus the other night. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, does not my friend——

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. As far as I am personally concerned, I absolutely repudiate his leadership upon the proposition that I am now considering.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will my friend permit me just a little further to suggest, does he not know that although that gentleman has been inveighing against the action of certain Democrats here, that in 1894, although the Democratic platform of 1892 had declared expressly for the repeal of the 10 per cent tax on State banks, he, being a Member of this House, not only voted against the repeal, but made a speech against it?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do remember that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, then, does not the gentleman also remember that although this distinguished gentleman from Nebraska inveighs against other Democrats for what he calls "bolting," he within the last year bolted the Democratic State ticket in the State of Nebraska and opposed the Democratic nominee for governor?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; but I do not want the gentleman to draw such a parallel between the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska and myself.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not trying to do so.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Are you now meaning to say that I am bolting the Democratic Party?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not at all, because I want to say to the gentleman from Colorado I think he is perfectly within his rights, because he simply invokes the rule of the caucus which permits him to do that. It is perfectly honorable and perfectly lawful and perfectly within the party lines, and no man can accuse him of bolting on that account, but what I do want to ask the gentleman is whether he thinks the gentleman who for three times has been honored by one of the great parties of the Nation by a nomination for the Presidency, who bolted the action of the Democratic National Convention not only for the 10 per cent tax on the bank proposition, but he bolted the nominee of his party for governor last year. Is he in any position to advise the Democratic Party as to principles and honor?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Well, I will say to the gentleman I have known the Nebraskan as long and possibly as intimately as anybody in this land. I know that he is obsessed upon this one proposition of free raw material. I am satisfied that there is not a man in the country who is as well posted upon matters generally as that gentleman, but I do believe he has been misled concerning this matter, for, as I have already stated, he made an announcement in his paper of date of the 9th of this month that there were only 22,000 people in the United States who were engaged in the sheep business.

The figures I have given you of the number of sheep owners in this country are taken from the United States Statistical Abstract, and must be regarded as correct as to the sheep owners, to say nothing of the number of herders and other employees.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand it to be the gentleman's opinion that the view of the gentleman from Nebraska touching the possibility of putting wool on the free list was, perhaps, affected particularly by the misinformation he had touching the number of people interested in the industry? In other words, had he known there were a million instead of 22,000, would he have changed his views?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I would hardly say. I prefer to give him the benefit of the doubt as to whether he knew how important this question was, and consequently I do not want to be led into inveighing against Mr. Bryan and his doctrines outside of and beyond this one question.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to ask my friend if he understands that the doctrine of free raw materials is a Democratic doctrine?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I know that it is not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Has it ever, by any Democratic national convention, been declared to be the policy of the Democratic Party?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Never; and never has been enunciated by any enlightened and intelligent leader of our party.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that I am not responsible for the bringing on of this colloquy; it will also be observed that I hold Mr. Bryan in as high esteem as any man on this floor; and it will further be observed—and I wish to accentuate this idea—that I am neither in accord with the views entertained by Mr. Bryan, nor am I in accord with the majority of my party on this question; and therefore I am solely responsible for the views I have presented. What I have said and what I shall say is inspired by purely patriotic feelings and for the welfare of the Democratic Party.

Now, Mr. Chairman, viewing the matter from a party standpoint, can you, my Democratic friends, view with equanimity the following table, showing the sheep and goat owners in 1910 in doubtful States?

	Sheep.	Goat.

[1] Goats.

Now, my Democratic friends, you can very safely multiply the number of sheep owners in the United States, as shown by the above table, by four, and this simple mathematical calculation will reveal, with what must strike you with potential and significant force, the very respectable voting strength of these citizens of our country who are either directly or indirectly interested in the sheep-growing industry of the various States I have enumerated, and it is this not inconsiderable and somewhat influential element with whom you will soon be called upon to reckon and suggest a defense of your position upon the pending measure. How will you meet them on your political "judgment day," and just how will you render an account of your stewardship? Let us pause awhile in some apprehension for the answer.

I listened with much interest to the remarks of those gentlemen who favor this measure, with a view to ascertaining with what school of philosophy they are identified, when in one breath they tell us that wool, next to vegetable life, is most necessary for the human race; and in the next, as further indicated in the laborious effort in the report accompanying the bill, to show that the world's production of wool is on the decrease, and not only not in this legislation but in none promised is or will there be an effort to stay the hand of time against the day when the production will cease. I agree fully with them that this bill, if enacted into law, will lessen the production of wool here, but I deny that there has been any material reduction in the world's supply, barring a few years of drought, which is known to have existed in Australia and other countries. But in the United States our production has increased about 54 per cent in the last 14 years, and there is not a sheep grower in the United States but who will inform you that if we are allowed the freedom of competition with the foreign grower, as contemplated by the present law, in less than 10 years we would be producing more than we consume and have a surplus in addition.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States, aside from a natural sentiment, much prefer to patronize their home industry, knowing full well, as I shall later demonstate conclusively, that ours is the best quality of wool that is raised in the world, and that if the home industry is destroyed they will be at the mercy of the foreign grower with respect to what they shall pay for an inferior article. The people of this country had an abiding object lesson of this. They were promised, before the passage of the Wilson tariff bill, that the home industry would not be destroyed and that they would be enabled to purchase clothing at a lower rate. The magnificent result of the passage of that bill and the net benefit to the people was a much inferior article of clothing and at no lower price, and the near destruction of the sheep industry.

I characterized the passage of the "free-meat" provision of the farmers' free-list bill as a stupendous legislative blunder and a monumental outrage against the interests of the farmer and stock grower. I now say the same, with added emphasis, as respects this insidious measure. There was absolutely no excuse for its birth, and there could be no logical apology for its existence.

Mr. Chairman, I am not, as is well known, a protectionist in the commonly accepted definition of that somewhat elastic and much-abused term, but I think I voice the sentiment of approval of the American producer when I say that I view with favor the incidental benefit and protection, if you please, that is afforded the articles of domestic production that are not on the free list, by the mutual competition of similar articles of foreign production that enter this country. This, I take it, in the last analysis, is the true, honest, and correct principle of protection in one aspect of the situation.

I can not, however, be too strong in condemnation of the thoroughly un-American and really recreant policy of enacting legislation which places it within the power of the speculator, vaguely denominated the "middle man," to not only rob the American sheep owner of the just and merited fruits of his labor but also to deprive the Government of revenue receipts aggregating more than $7,000,000, as is the case in this instance, every dollar of which he appropriates to his own selfish purposes while he reaps a golden harvest from the proceeds of his nefarious work, importing no greater amount of wool than he has been importing under the present bill, and we have already seen that he has been importing much more than has been consumed. It has been suggested in a nebulous way that the ultimate consumer will be benefited by this measure, but is it not irresistably logical that as long as there is no specific law on the statute book which compels him to sell at a stipulated price it is within his power, and it is perfectly needless to say he will not fail to avail of it, to charge what he pleases and "bear" the market to the unfortunate producer?

Mr. Chairman, I concede to no man on this floor a greater devotion to and longer services in the maintenance of the principles of our party. There are few if any Members on this floor who enjoy as I do the rare distinction of having voted for 11 different nominees of the Democratic Party for the presidency. In a majority of those elections I was not only one of the modest counselors in the party but was a candidate for elector or some office. I think I am as well informed as the ordinary Member of what our party has stood for in the past and the place it occupies to-day with reference to the tariff, and my vote against the reciprocity agreement, and against the free-meat clause of the farmers' free-list bill, and my position on this bill I claim to be in strict accord with Democratic doctrine as declared by our Democratic platforms, as well as consistent with the intelligent thought expressed by the foremost of our statesmen.

Hear what President James K. Polk said in his message which preceded the Walker tariff law:

> The terms "protection to domestic industry" are of popular import, but they should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer or planter who toils yearly in his fields is engaged in "domestic industry," and is as much entitled to have his labor "protected" as the manufacturer, the man of commerce, the navigator, or the mechanic who are engaged also in "domestic industry" in their different pursuits. The joint labors of all these classes constitute in the aggregate the "domestic industry" of the Nation, and they are equally entitled to the Nation's "protection."

And the author of the bill of 1842, Mr. Walker, said:

> It discriminates in favor of the manufacturer and against agriculture by imposing many higher duties upon the manufactured fabric than upon the agricultural product out of which it is made.

Andrew Jackson said:

> The agricultural interest of our country is so essentially connected with every other, and is so superior in importance to them all, that it is scarcely necessary to invite to it your attention. It is principally as manufactures and commerce tend to increase the value of agricultural productions and to extend their application to the wants and comforts of society that they deserve the fostering care of government.
> The general rule to be applied in graduating duties upon articles of foreign growth or manufacture is that which will place our own in fair competition with those of other countries, and the inducements to advance even a step beyond this point are controlling in regard to those articles which are of primary necessity in time of war.

Albert Gallatin said:

> as shall be consistent with the purposes of revenue and equal in its operation on the different parts of the United States, and on the various interests of the same.

The Democratic platform of 1888 declared:

> Our established domestic industries and enterprises should not and need not be endangered by the reduction and correction of the burdens of taxation. On the contrary, a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises by giving them assurance of an extended market and steady and continuous operations.

The Democratic platform of 1896 declared:

> We hold that tariff duties should be levied for purposes of revenue, such duties to be so adjusted as to operate equally throughout the country, and not discriminate between class or section, and that taxation should be limited by the needs of the Government honestly and economically administered.

The Democratic platform of 1904 said:

> So levied as not to discriminate against any industry, class, or section, to the end that the burdens of taxation shall be distributed as equally as possible.

I am addressing myself to this bill as if it declared straight out for free wool, because I will show before concluding that at the present price of wool in this country it is as disastrous to the woolgrower as if the declaration should be for free wool absolutely. And it is not without amusement that I have witnessed the controversy going on between Members on this side. Some are trying to uphold the bill because it is protection, others would like to defeat it because it is protection, and it is also rather humorous to listen to the controversy that has been indulged in between the distinguished Nebraskan and those here in favor of the small duty placed upon wool in the bill.

I do not think this distinguished citizen of Nebraska need tear off more than his outer shirt concerning the position of our distinguished friends, the honorable Speaker, our honored leader the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and others, for, from my viewpoint, the inoculation of these leaders with the protection germ for the wool industry will not bring on even the mildest incipient case of varioloid. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, if the references I have given do not commit the Democratic Party to the doctrine of free wool, then we should look elsewhere for reasons for the passage of this bill. I am not a close student of the Bible, though I believe in the Book; I am possibly more familiar with the laws of our country, and I fail to find either in divine or human law any authority, under any condition or circumstance, that would justify this Government in passing a law to take a dollar from my pocket and transfer it to that of my neighbor, nor the bread that belongs to the mouths of my children to those of my neighbor's. I believe that immoral principle is here invoked, and, believing that, my conscience withholds my vote for this bill in its present form. It is worse than that; it does not go to the mouths, nor my neighbor's children, but to the foreign producer. Now, if from first to last I do not establish the proposition I make, then my attitude allows criticism, but that criticism should not go beyond a reflection upon my intelligence.

Mr. Chairman, it is often said that a Congressman's vote upon the tariff question is controlled by the interests involved to his immediate constituents. Whilst I deny that is entirely so in my case, yet I am not without sufficient reason to oppose this measure, viewed from that standpoint.

My State is credited with having a million and a half of sheep in 1910, but the number was very much greater than that. However, that would place her about seventh in rank of sheep-producing States of the Union. Besides, we have 37,669 goats, the clip of which is of vast importance to our State, and which also comes under the ban of this bill. We have 1,865 farms producing sheep and 1,185 farms producing goats, and I think it is safe to calculate there are at least 4 adults connected with or dependent upon the industry of each farm; there would therefore be 12,200 such persons, the same being one-eighth of the voting population, which, measured by the difference between the two parties in that State, would equal if not exceed a majority. And whilst it is neither here nor there, so far as the merits of this question are concerned, nevertheless, as a devotee of the Democratic Party, I can not close my eyes to the fact that in my judgment there will be at least 12,200 votes, regardless of party, that will be cast against anyone who believes in destroying these two industries of our State. The woolgrowers of that State drank very deeply from the bitter cup of adversity that followed the enactment of the Wilson law. The people of my district during the past winter and spring lost upon their feeding of lambs over a million and a half dollars. Whether justified or not, they believe the hue and cry of the high cost of living, accompanied by the threat of the free importation of meats by subsequent legislation, brought about this loss. Moreover, since the 1st day of May, consequent to the depression in the price of wool, occasioned by the introduction of this bill, they have lost on their wool clip over $400,000. This statement is based upon the wool clip of 1910, as given by the Statistical Abstract, and upon advice by wire I have just received that their loss will be not less than 5 cents per pound, and I regard these figures as extremely conservative. Further, not only in Colorado, but elsewhere, the sheepmen have for years been obliged to borrow money to keep up their foals, expecting always that wool prices and mutton prices would go up.

The wool speculator takes advantage of this situation at all times, and he is especially active in his inactivity to purchase at the present time, believing that prices will lower. The banker is anxious and is insisting upon his money; therefore the poor sheep grower is confronted with the importunate banker, the rapacious speculator, the manufacturer, and the Woolen Trust, clamoring for cheaper wool.

Beyond that, Mr. Chairman, we have a young and rapidly growing Commonwealth. The injury to one industry has always a reflecting and baleful influence upon all others. Our State was nearly depopulated at one time by reason of the demonetization of silver. We are to-day cursed and tax-ridden by the Federal Government in its "new national" doctrine of capitalizing all our natural resources to produce an asset for revenue purposes, and it has driven thousands upon thousands of our best citizens away, retarding beyond measure, in many ways I have not time to point out, the settlement and development of our State.

We live a long way from a central market for our products. Our sources of revenue from cultivation of the soil is now, and for many years to come must be, from the raising of live stock. With free trade with Canada, free meats from the world, and free wool, in my judgment, the clock of progress in our State will be turned back a quarter of a century.

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, I read in vain our platforms to find we are pledged to the Canadian agreement, the free-meat clause in the farmers' free list bill, or the passage of this bill. I search in vain through the columns of debates in the Sixty-first Congress on the tariff bill, and I remember the speeches made during the campaign of 1908 and 1910 by our Democratic leaders, but I neither find in one or the other a syllable expressing a promise for free wool should our party be elevated to power. It certainly was not heard upon the stump in Colorado, nor did it find expression in any of the many Democratic journals of that State over the period mentioned.

I could, Mr. Chairman, bring myself to a more patient pass should I have heard anyone upon this floor undertake to demonstrate that the consumer would obtain a benefit from the passage of the wool provision in this bill. And here let me say that the duty on raw wool has never been a feature in regulating the price paid by the consumer for woolen clothing, because the amount of wool that enters into a suit of all-wool clothing is so small as to be of no consideration when compared to the enormous profits of the middleman. The average suit of clothes requires 3¾ yards of cloth weighing from 10 to 14 ounces per yard. A 12-ounce cloth, then, if made of all wool, would require approximately 8 pounds of average American wool as it comes from the sheep. This wool is now selling at 16 cents a pound; therefore the woolgrower is receiving less than $1.30 for furnishing all the wool that goes to make a suit of clothes. If you figure out the price he is receiving for the wool, namely, 16 cents per pound, and what it has cost him to produce it, he is losing in the furnishing of that 8 pounds of average American wool from 25 to 40 cents per suit; in other words, even under the present law he is making a present to every person purchasing a suit of clothes of from 25 to 40 cents out of his labor and capital. And Heaven only knows what his loss would be measured by the present bill.

I will deflect for a time to the consideration of the objection to the ad valorem mode of fixing the duty as against the specific duty. Ad valorem duties are unfair to the grower of wool, as well as the users of woolen clothing, and offer most protection at a time when least is needed and the least protection when most is needed. For example, on a 20 per cent ad valorem basis—that being the basis of this bill—when wool is 20 cents per pound in London the duty would be 4 cents per pound; when wool is 10 cents per pound in London—when we most need protection—the duty would be 2 cents per pound. Ad valorem duties always lead to undervaluation and put a premium on dishonesty and tend to drive honest importers out of the business.

Wool is a commodity possessed of many variations. It is imported from nearly every nation on the globe, including many that are but partly civilized. It is bought in different manners—some direct from the grower, some through commission men, and some at the market places. Considering the wide variation in quality, the great number of nations from which it is imported, and the different methods of purchasing it, it is perfectly absurd to assume that any customs official should place any different valuation upon imported wool other than that given by the importer.

It is asserted that our customs officials could ascertain the value at which a shipment of wool was sold in the foreign market. This in some instances may be true, but, as I have said, much of our wool is not bought at public auction, and that which is bought at such sales could easily, on account of the insignificant charge for water transportation, be reshipped from the point of purchase to some other port and thence rebilled for shipment to the United States, thus most effectually defeating any effort to determine the point of origin of the consignment.

The value of wool rests largely upon the amount that it may shrink when scoured, and the only way our customs officials could even hope to arrive at an estimate of the foreign value of the consignment of wool would be to scour samples of it and obtain its value in that manner. This law, however, does not permit such a procedure.

Most honest importers are opposed to the ad valorem basis, for on such a basis they must either adopt the tactics of the most dishonest importer or be driven from business by unfair competition.

In all fairness I may ask how our customs officials could determine the foreign value of a shipment of wool purchased direct from the grower, or through some commission firm, in Egypt, Peru, or Russia.

The ad valorem duties are unfair to the consumer of woolen clothing, for under their operation only the lower grades or cheaper wools will be imported. It is only natural to assume that if the duty on a good wool, costing 20 cents per pound, is 4 cents, and a poorer wool costing 10 cents per pound could be imported for 2 cents, it naturally follows that the importer will select the poorer wool in order to effect a saving in duties. This practically would rob our producers and consumers by loading the country up with inferior wools.

The operation of ad valorem duties may be fairly estimated from the result of the tariff upon carpet wools during the past year. The present duty on carpet wools provides that wools valued at 12 cents per pound or less shall be admitted for 4 cents duty; if valued at over 12 cents per pound, the duty is 7 cents per pound. This, in effect, is an ad valorem duty. Last year's custom reports show that out of 115,000,000 pounds of carpet wool imported over 70 per cent came in valued at less than 12 cents per pound and paid the duty of 4 cents per pound, and less than 30 per cent was valued at over 12 cents per pound and paid the duty of 7 cents per pound. This occurred at a time when carpet wools were extremely high abroad, and when many well-informed people estimate that over 90 per cent of them probably cost in excess of 12 cents per pound and should have paid the 7-cent duty. The gross frauds apparently practiced in these carpet wools convinced many that this ad valorem duty should be abolished and a flat specific duty given to all carpet wools.

It is a common argument of those who seek the destruction of the sheep industry that that has nothing to do with the maintenance of the industry. Every statistic available as to our sheep industry refutes this argument. By examining the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, we find that in 1897, following free trade in wool, the number of sheep in the United States was 36,819,000, valued at $1.82 per head, or a total value of $67,021,000. In the year 1910 the same report shows 57,216,000 sheep, valued at $4.08 per head, with a total value of $233,664,000. Thus showing an increase of sheep, after 14 years of protection, of approximately 50 per cent and an increase in value of 248 per cent.

In addition to this enormous increase we must recall the fact that in 1897 we were normally consuming about 8,000,000 muttons per year, while in the year 1910 it is estimated we consumed between 15,000,000 and 16,000,000 muttons. Had the consupmtion of mutton not increased and had wool production been very profitable during the past 14 years, it is safe to assume that to-day our wool production would fully equal home demands.

Again, in determining the number of our sheep, we must not lose sight of the fact that the national forests during the past five years have been a factor in somewhat decreasing their numbers by the withdrawing of grazing privileges.

The woolgrowers have not, for many years, received the full protection the law specifies and which it intended they should receive.

When the Morrill law was first passed, in 1867, the duty that it gave to the sheepman upon wool was based upon the fact that foreign wool and domestic wool shrunk about the same amount during the process of scouring, or approximately 66⅔ per cent. In other words, it required 3 pounds of grease wool, either foreign or domestic, to produce 1 pound of scoured wool. Foreign and domestic wools at that time did shrink from 60 to 75 per cent, and therefore the protection given the grower against a pound of foreign wool was equal to the protection indicated in the law. The importer of wool soon saw that under this arrangement he was paying a duty on dirt and grease, and forthwith set about to obtain foreign wools of lighter shrinkage, in order that he might get more scoured wool for the same amount of duty. Foreign growers being anxious to meet the American demand, began the production of light-shrinking wool through care in their sorting and preparation for our markets.

The wools were sorted and those of light shrinkage packed separately for the American markets. The cross-bred wools were substituted for the fine merino, and all wools were partially willowed before being packed. These efforts on the part of the foreign grower soon resulted in a material reduction in the shrinkage of foreign wools, and the climax was reached when the skirting clause was added to Schedule K. This clause permitted the foreign grower to skirt—that is, remove the necks, legs, bellies, tags, or locks from every fleece of wool and permitted the importation of the light-shrinking remainder of the fleece, without additional duty. It must be apparent to all that the removal of these parts of the fleece removed the part containing the greatest shrink, and is an injustice to the American grower, who must sell his fleeces intact. The skirts removed from foreign fleeces are not imported and are used by foreign manufacturers. The skirting process has gone on until to-day practically all of the class 1 wools imported into the United States are skirted wools.

In this process of evolution wools which shrank from 60 to 75 per cent as imported in 1867 shrink from 26 to 52 per cent as now imported. Of course, this assertion means that a cross-bred wool has been substituted for a merino and that the merino itself has been materially reduced in shrinkage.

American wools average 61 per cent in shrink, and the wools of Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Texas, Kansas, California, Arizona, and New Mexico shrink on an average of from 63 to 69 per cent. Therefore these heavy-shrinking wools have been displaced by imported wools shrinking on an average of but little more than half of what our wools shrink, and as a result our growers have but little more than half of the protection the law intended them to have.

We imported in 1909 about 20,000,000 pounds of class 1 wool from New Zealand. These wools shrunk when scoured from 26 to 38 per cent, averaging about 32 to 34 per cent shrink.

We imported from South America over 57,000,000 pounds of class 1 wool, shrinking from 30 to 39 per cent and averaging about 34 per cent.

We imported from Australia 60,000,000 pounds of class 1 wool, shrinking from 38 to 54 per cent, with very little shrink as high as 50 per cent.

All of these wools were skirted and paid a duty on the grease pound of 11 cents. Since the New Zealand wools averaged about 34 per cent in shrink, the importer paid in duty 17 cents to obtain sufficient wool to make 1 pound of scoured wool.

The average shrink of the wools from South America was 34 per cent. Therefore, the importer paid in duty about 17 cents to obtain 1 pound of scoured wool.

The duty paid to obtain a pound of Australian scoured wool was a trifle higher, but I am informed does not exceed 22 cents.

On all of the above wools the law says the duty on a pound of scoured wool shall be 33 cents, yet, as I have shown, in reality about half of this is collected on sufficient wool in the grease to produce 1 pound of scoured wool.

You will readily understand that if 3 pounds of our western wool are required to make 1 pound of scoured wool, and if sufficient foreign wool to make 1 pound of scoured wool can be imported for, say, 18 cents in duty, the actual protection our growers receive against foreign wool would be one-third of 18 cents, or 6 cents per pound. We are charged with getting 11 cents protection on class 1 wool, when in reality we have but little more than half of this amount, and in every argument made against the tariff on raw wool they have calculated the increased cost of clothing to the consumer by reason of this tariff, upon the assumption that the growers received the full protection the law intended to give.

Now, when we consider class 2 wools, the situation is just as bad. These are the wools taken from the mutton sheep, such as should be extensively raised throughout all portions of this Nation and a sheep which we can raise as good, if not better, than any other portion of the world. These sheep are largely English breeds of sheep, some of which produce what is known as the luster wools, and I am told by manufacturers and by cloth importers that the United States can and does produce the best luster wool raised in the world. Now it has been asserted that we do not raise these class 2 wools. This is a falsehood, and I want to say that the sheep breeders of this Nation are prepared to produce all the class 2 wool that this country can ever consume any time they are given a modest degree of protection which would permit its production.

The law says the duty on 1 pound of wool of class 2, either washed or unwashed, is 12 cents per pound. We imported last year 31,000,000 pounds of this class of wool, shrinking from 16 to 26 per cent, and averaging not to exceed 20 per cent. Therefore the importer obtained enough of this class of wool in the grease to make 1 pound of scoured wool for 15 cents in duty. The shrink of this class of wool is a matter of record and was testified to before the House Ways and Means Committee two years ago, and is fully established. If there be those who doubt the accuracy of these figures as to shrinkage of foreign wools, I would refer them to page 20 of the "Wool Year Book," a standard publication of the wool industry of England, published by the Technical College, Bradford, England, and to the further fact that these statements have been made by men who know the wool industry.

No one denies that our importers handle only the lightest shrinking wool, on account of the reduction in duty. In the foreign markets the term "suitable for American trade" always means light shrinkage.

In referring further to the actual protection received by our growers, it has been repeatedly charged and never successfully denied that carpet wools imported at 4 or 7 cents per pound are used to a considerable extent in the manufacture of clothing. The extent to which these wools are used for this purpose can not be accurately ascertained and can only be estimated from the fact that carpet wools are advertised for "better than carpet purposes," and by the further fact that one most frequently sees upon the streets and in the stores suits of clothing made from carpet wool. The use of these wools for clothing purposes is admitted by the manufacturers of carpets in their brief submitted to the Ways and Means Committee. Every pound of carpet wool used for clothing purposes displaces a pound of American-grown wool and defrauds our woolgrowers out of the protection the law intended to give them.

The shrinkage of foreign-grown wools has grown less year by year, and will continue to grow less as time goes on. Just as this shrinkage decreases, the actual protection afforded to our growers also decreases.

It must be conceded by all that the cost of producing wool in this country is far greater than it was when the Morrill law was first passed. In fact the cost is gradually increasing each year and is now 50 per cent greater than it was just a few years ago. During all this time that the cost of producing American wool has been increasing, the actual protection that our growers receive from the tariff against foreign wool has been decreasing, due to the decreasing shrink of imported wools, and the wonder is, not that we do not produce all the wool consumed in this country, but that we do produce as much as we do.

It has been stated that this bill, at 20 per cent ad valorem, gives the grower a protection of 5 cents per pound, but in view of the light shrinkage of imported wools, an evil which is not corrected by this bill, the actual protection that it would afford our growers against imported wool would be from 2 to 3 cents per pound, not taking into account the fraud that would be practiced by undervaluations. Figuring 3 pounds of our Western wool to make 1 pound of scoured wool, our protection per pound under this bill would be approximately 2.9 cents, if undervaluation was not practiced. This is but little more than sufficient to equalize the difference in the cost of transporting wool from foreign countries to Boston and from our Western States to Boston. The Western woolgrower pays from $1.75 to $2.50 per hundred pounds for freight on his wool in the grease to Boston, Philadelphia, or New York, the points to which our wool must be shipped. Wool can be laid down in Boston or New York from South America at less than one-half cent per pound in the grease. And everyone knows that wool is produced in the great producing countries of the world for less than one-half the cost of production in the United States.

The cost of producing wool in the United States is a matter of record and will be found fully itemized in the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee in the brief presented for the National Woolgrowers' Association by Messrs. Hagenbarth, Stericker, and Knollin.

The amount of money paid to labor by our woolgrowers ranges from 75 cents to $1.25 per head, amounting in the aggregate to $60,000,000 per year. The number of laborers engaged in caring for our sheep is over 150,000, and this figure does not include those engaged in other lines of industry dependent upon the sheep industry for its existence. The census shows about 756,474 individual woolgrowers in the United States.

Our Nation has built up a sheep industry which supplies our people with 330,000,000 pounds of the best wool in the world. American wool is superior to imported wool and outwears it, grade for grade, to a considerable degree. It is stronger, works better, wears better, and is better than imported wool. Our Government recognizes this fact, and in all contracts which it lets for woolen clothing for our Army and Navy specifies that only American-grown wool can be used in their manufacture. As tending to show the quality of foreign wools that are largely imported into this country, and upon which our people would have to depend for their clothing if our sheep industry is struck down, I submit the following statements from the Wool Yearbook previously referred to. This book gives the quality and uses of foreign wool and ours:

South American wools: Used as cheap material for blending or medium-quality dress goods. The weakness found in these wools are in strength and uniformity, this being somewhat marked.

African wools: These wools are slightly inferior in strength and are indifferent as to felting quality. Used as cheap material for blending or for medium-quality dress goods.

American wools: Used for the best grade for American trade.

It has been asserted that the sheep industry was limited in scope, but this is misrepresentation. The sheep industry obtains in practically every State in the Union, and it is an industry that should be maintained upon every American farm.

It is believed by some that the wool men make an immense profit from the production of mutton; but, unfortunately, mutton production has not been profitable. The report of the Department of Agriculture shows that the average price paid the woolgrower for 100 pounds of mutton in Chicago during the past six years is $5.13. This certainly is a reasonable price, and its production at this price has lost millions of dollars to the American sheep breeders. If the consumer has paid more than this for his mutton, the woolgrower did not get the difference and can not be blamed for the cost of meat at retail.

If we slaughter in this country annually 15,000,000 mutton, they will average, dressed, approximately 50 pounds each. Therefore the sheep industry furnishes our people with 750,000,000 pounds of meat per year. A reduction in the tariff on wool in the past, when the cost of production was low, has always meant a serious reduction in the number of sheep. A reduction in the duty now, when cost of production is high, means the destruction of the sheep industry and the removal of this annual meat supply of 750,000,000 pounds. This can not help but be reflected in the upward price of other meats. It is, therefore, of vital interest to the average citizen that we maintain our sheep industry in order that our people may have access to an increasing supply of meats. Mutton is recognized as a most desirable food on account of the fact that it is nutritious, low in price, and not bulky in volume, and to the further fact that sheep suffer from no contagious disease communicable to man. The reports of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry indicate that less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the sheep inspected by its employees are condemned, something that can not be said for other meat foods.

A strenuous effort is made to demonstrate that the lowering of the duties on imported wool will not reduce the production in this country. On the other hand, those who oppose the reduction provided in the bill say that it necessarily will curtail the home production, and the arguments in support of the one or the other position center around the conditions prevailing just before, during, and just after the period when the Wilson tariff law of 1894 was enacted.

It would seem that it would be entirely unnecessary to go to that period or any other to solve the question, for the reason that it seems to me it goes without saying that since the imports and the local production combined are sufficient as a supply for home consumption that the importation of one pound more would necessarily tend to curtail the local or home production, for we must assume that it would lower the price, the doing of which would curtail the production. This must be true unless the price will rise out of proportion to the increased supply.

However, let us briefly examine the history of the wool business over the period of time mentioned.

The bill went into effect in 1895. Our production was 309,748,000. In 1896 it fell to 274,708,000 pounds; in 1897, the last year of the law, it fell to 259,153,251 pounds, a decrease of 50,594,749. The production since has constantly grown. In 1910 it was 281,363,000, showing an increase of 26 per cent.

Now, look at the imports. In addition to the imports of wool, we imported in three and one-half years under the Wilson bill 76,736,522 pounds of waste noils, rags, and shoddy. This reduced to its wool equivalent amounts to 230,209,566 pounds; in other words, it displaced that amount of our wool in the grease. Adding the above imports of shoddy, the wool imports, the total import of wool for the Wilson bill was 1,018,005,522. Compare this with the imports of shoddy, and so forth, during the three years beginning with 1898, which amounted to only 1,250,377 pounds, or an equivalent of our wool in the grease of 3,751,131 pounds. Add to this the imports of wool from 1898 to 1900, which amounted to 365,459,000, giving us a total import of only 369,210,000 pounds of wool and its equivalent in shoddy, showing an excess of importation under the Wilson bill of shoddy of 226,458,435 pounds, and an increase of wool imports of 422,337,000 pounds, or an increase in wool, shoddy, and so forth, during the period of the Wilson bill of 648,795,491 pounds.

Now, in the face of these figures, where is the man who has the assurance to say that the Wilson bill had no effect upon the importation of wool, the kind of clothing, and so forth, and by the same token can he say that the American woolgrower will not be injured by the enactment into law of the present bill?

Besides there was carried over from 1895, 194,724,651 pounds; from 1896, 393,986,523 pounds; from 1897, 794,484,726 pounds; from 1898, 761,515,011 pounds; from 1899, 589,891,246 pounds; from 1900, 494,073,762 pounds; from 1901, 396,818,135 pounds; from 1902, 314,760,961 pounds; from 1903, 286,097,713 pounds; from 1904, 283,622,700 pounds; from 1905, 253,524,107 pounds; from 1906, 180,299,002 pounds; from 1907, 158,115,586 pounds; from 1908, 228,515,586 pounds.

Now, this is over and above consumption and export. It demonstrates beyond question that during these 13 years the importer and speculator had a firm grip upon the wool business. With this large surplus on hand, from time to time he was enabled to manipulate the market against the stock grower as well as the manufacturer, and since 1908 there has been carried over not so much, but many million pounds. On the day this bill was introduced I wired to the customs officers in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia and ascertained that there was in bond in warehouses imported wool equivalent to one-fifth of our production for the year of 1910. And if there be added to this our surplus held by speculators, there is every reason to believe the entire amount will be somewhere in the neighborhood of the other figures I have given.

Now, you propose by this bill to exactly double the power of the speculator and importer to manipulate the market and drive down the price of the home sheep grower's wool by cutting the duties the importer did pay in half, thus enabling him to rob the Government of more than the $7,000,000, that being the amount of revenue we give up under the bill. You see that he was not only willing to pay the duties under the present law, but to import more than was needed for consumption; so, as a revenue measure, the bill must prove worse than a failure.

It is known that sheep will eat and destroy over 300 different varieties of weeds. Before I was pressed into the service of the Government for years they were the only lawn mower I had on my place. They are the only positive exterminators of the dandelion. Extracts from many of the glands of the animal are now recognized by the medical profession as being absolutely necessary for the nourishment of the ill and staying the hand of death, and especially is it valuable as a remedy for that aggravating and persistent affection—asthma.

It has grown to be a custom to refer to our venerable Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, as an authority upon all subjects pertaining to stock growing. I wish to read you what he says about sheep and the sheep industry of this country, and I especially commend it to my fellows on this side who speak so hopefully of the extermination of sheep:

SECRETARY WILSON'S LETTER.

I regret very much that it is impossible for me to accept your kind invitation and attend the annual meeting of your association. It gives me pleasure, however, to send representatives of the Department of Agriculture and to write this message to the convention.

I look upon the development of the sheep industry as a positive necessity for the agriculture of the country, and it should be encouraged all along the line.

Owing to the increase in the price of beef, the increase in the number of people in the cities who live in apartments, and the apparent decrease in the size of families in the cities, housekeepers have found it to their advantage to purchase cuts of meat which are low in price, comparatively small in bulk, and which are used up before they are kept any length of time in a refrigerator. These facts have caused the great extension of the use of mutton by the American people, and a great deal of the prejudice that formerly existed toward this meat has been swept away. The development of the use of mutton in the country has revolutionized the sheep business. The farmer in the East finds that he can make sheep profitable by growing them for sale as meat-producing animals, with the wool as an incidental item of revenue. The ranchman of the West finds that he can add very much to the income from his sheep by paying more attention to the mutton form of his animals.

In the solution of the problem how to feed and clothe our rapidly growing population from our own resources, the sheep will receive increased attention as time goes on, for the reason that sheep lend themselves perhaps more readily than any other animal to the development of agriculture. On almost every farm there could and should be a flock of sheep. In the thickly settled sections of the East, where the raising of beef cattle is becoming more and more difficult, sheep will thrive with a profit. The weeds of the roadside and the fence rows, the stubble field after the grain is harvested, and even the lawn can be turned into a profit if sheep are allowed access to them. There are millions of acres east of the Mississippi; I might say east of the Alleghenies and south as well as north of the Ohio River, that should maintain sheep. New England, which was formerly the center of the sheep-breeding industry, could produce annually many thousand of sheep at a minimum cost.

Somehow the American farmer has not appreciated the full value of the sheep as a meat producer and a renovator of the soil. The spring lamb that comes on the market during the summer is the one kind of meat that has been produced without feeding grain, and that is a mighty reason for the increase of the sheep industry.

The department has three flocks of sheep with which it is studying the industry—one in Vermont, one at the experiment station of the Bureau of Animal Industry near Washington, and one in Wyoming. In the work in Vermont we are endeavoring to encourage the New England people to get back into sheep raising. The sheep near Washington are being used in breeding experiments of various kinds and those in Wyoming in a breeding experiment to study the possibility of improving the type of sheep used on the range. In the Wyoming work the sheep have been selected for mutton form and high wool production, merino stock (principally Rambouillet) being used. The work has not yet gone far enough for us to make exhibitions of these sheep, and on this account we have been compelled to decline many cordial invitations to show them. Furthermore, we have not yet been in a position to make a thorough study of the wool which is being produced. I regard it as of the highest importance that scientific investigations be made of the effects of soil, climate, breeding, and feeding on wool. This will be done with the Wyoming flock. Some persons seem to think that American wool is deficient in quality. If this is true, the Department of Agriculture should ascertain the reasons and show sheepmen how they may breed and handle their sheep to produce wool of the highest quality.

It has been estimated that one sheep would add to the fertility of the soil $2 worth to every acre of agricultural land in the United States. For fear you will fall in your seats with a paralytic stroke, I will not here give you the number of millions of dollars that would add to our national wealth, but will leave you to figure this out for yourselves when you have left this stifling Hall, with its condensed heat, and have secured a comfortable seat before the friendly breeze of an electric fan. [Laughter.]

Besides that, it is known that the sheep industry has ever been a respectable calling since the days of Abraham, that old patriarch and flockmaster, so willing to sacrifice his son Isaac as a burnt offering instead of a ram, until prevailed upon by the Lord to choose the latter.

Going back further than that, we find that wool knocked the fig leaf out of business.

During the course of my colloquy with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS], I tried to obtain from him some idea as to what we were going to use as a substitute for wool when he undertook to show that the growing of sheep was fast approaching an end. He drove the diminishing number from Vermont through the continent, over the trackless wastes, westward, owing, as he said, to the price of lands, and so forth, and was proceeding to drive them from my State over the snowy mountain tops, then with lolling tongues through the deserts beyond, seeking always for pastures new and green, until finally I had him driving them into the Pacific Ocean, feeding on crabs. [Laughter.] But neither he nor any other Member of whom I sought information concerning what the world was going to do for clothing when the sheep disappeared could afford me the slightest information. I do not share with them their prejudice against woolen clothing, nor yet their affection for the fig leaf. [Laughter.]

No, Mr. Chairman, there will at most be but a temporary cessation in this country of the production of sheep. Phoenix-like it will rise again as it has in times past, resisting the assaults of its enemies and manipulators and pursuing its invincible course, for it is as absolutely indestructible as an industry as it is imperishable and a necessity. But for the industrious and irrepressible ragpicker it would now be selling at at least a dollar a pound. Likely the suit of clothes you now wear contains the wool that was clipped from the back of a sheep three or four hundred years ago, for like gold it ever retains its intrinsic worth and its evolutions are practically limitless.

Many of you doubtless have in your households treasured antiques a thousand years old. There are prayer rugs known to be over 4,000 years old, the wool in which might have been clipped by Abraham, and as they are rare, there are many imitations of them. I bespeak for you, my friends, in the hour, yea hours, of your atonement for the sin you will commit in the passage of this bill the peculiar appropriateness of a prayer rug woven from the fleece of the American sheep; that your hands may be raised alike in supplication for pardon and benediction of the home-grown product which makes so much for American greatness. From the cradle to the grave, from the clipper's hand to the tailor's shears its fruitful coat of down has ever thrown its benign protection around young and old. The babe in arms, the rugged mountaineer, the aged and infirm alike are secure within its ample folds, and the best that is within us should be devoted to its safety and not its sacrifice.

No, Mr. Chairman, nor will the sheepmen be entirely exterminated, though what you have done and are now contemplating will put millions upon millions of dollars into the pockets of wool speculators, importers, and commission men, and will bankrupt 80 per cent of the men whose principal business is sheep raising. They may become tramps for a while, but there is time enough between now and the November election of 1912 for them to find a temporary lodgment long enough to qualify themselves as voters. Nor is the time too short between now and then for the consumer of woolen goods to find out that he has been buncoed, just as he was when promised by the Sixty-first Congress lower prices for leather goods in exchange for the duty upon hides. And unless I miss my guess those bankrupt and disappointed people will not cast their votes at that election for anyone who is not able to convince them that the passage of the measure will redound to their benefit.

A Democratic speech would be incomplete without referring to some sayings and doings of Jefferson, who was not only the "Father of Democracy," but the Abraham of our country. When the soil on his land began wearing out under the intense farming of grain, he said:

The first step toward the recovering of our land is to find substitutes for grain and bacon. I count on potatoes, clover, and sheep—the two former to feed every animal on the farm except my negroes, and the latter to feed them, diversified with rations of salt fish and molasses, both of them wholesome, agreeable, and cheap articles of food.

Capt. Edmund Bacon, who was for 20 years the overseer and business man of Jefferson's plantation at Monticello, says:

Mr. Jefferson was very fond of all kinds of good stock. The first full-blooded merino sheep in all that country was imported by Mr. Jefferson for himself and Mr. Madison while he was President. When I got home I put a notice in the paper at Charlottesville that persons who wished to improve their stock could send us two ewes, and we would keep them until the lambs were old enough to wean, and then give the owners the choice of the lambs and they leave the other lamb and both of the ewes.

We got the greatest lot of sheep, more than we wanted; two or three hundred, I think; and in a few years we had an immense flock. People came a long distance to buy our full-blooded sheep. At first we sold them for $50, but they soon fell to thirty and twenty, and before I left Mr. Jefferson merino sheep were so numerous that they sold about as cheap as the common ones. Some years afterwards he imported sheep from Barbary, I think, four large broad-tailed sheep. I have forgotten their names. He sent these from Washington in his own wagon, which had gone there with a load from Monticello. These sheep made very fine mutton, but they were not so popular—did not disseminate and ran out in a few years.

Mr. Jefferson, by this reference, can not by any source of reasoning be regarded as a free trader.

I want to say another word to my Democratic friends and call their attention to the Democratic platform of 1908 on this subject:

We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list, and material reductions shall be made in the tariff upon the necessaries of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home, and graduated reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

Reading between the lines, it follows you have not observed its direction by the taking of the duty off what you term "trust-made goods," but you have gone beyond this direction of reducing duties when applied to the wool features of this bill, for I have sufficiently demonstrated the reduction is but in name, avowedly only for the purpose of revenue, and means the destruction of the wool industry, and that was never contemplated by that convention, and much less by any other declaration of the party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I would like five minutes more.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is now 25 minutes of 12 o'clock, but I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I will endeavor to finish in that time.

Calmly, if you can, consider the situation of the woolgrower. We see him beset with every difficulty arising from the higher cost of wages, the increased value of lands, depleted pastures incident to droughts, yearly destruction of his flocks by the storm king, the increased rate of interest owing to his hazardous business, compelling him to sell his clip often before it leaves the sheep's back—the ever-ready victim of the speculator, the shuttlecock of tariff legislation—compelled to compete with the hatless and breechclouted bushman of Australia. And if placed in the position of the wildcat, prone on his back, surrounded by a pack of snarling, snapping hounds, is it passing strange that he should be less like the wildcat in not being over-punctilious as to whether he would use his teeth or his claws in defense? [Applause on the Republican side.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me recommend, in all seriousness, the cultivation of a more intimate acquaintanceship on the part of legislators with the American sheep, in whose behalf I speak to-day, and a more thorough realization of what is due it both from a commercial and a sentimental standpoint.

From the commercial viewpoint it represents one of our very greatest and most far-reaching industries, involving, as I have already said, the investment of immense capital, careful and skillful business methods, and invoking the most intelligent operation of its affairs.

Its perennial yield furnishes the means of livelihood to thousands upon thousands of our countrymen in all of its ramifications, from the shears of the clipper to the shears of the tailor, and in the inherent durability of its weave it is a never-ceasing source of comfort from the cradle to the grave.

Gentlemen, you who would pass this measure, with what degree of assurance will you return to your homes, witness the gamboling of the golden hoofs—yes, and golden possibilities—upon the hillside, and greet your farmer constituents, in view of the devastation you have wrought them in this pernicious enactment?

Mr. Chairman, the wool feature of this bill is incomplete, inadequate, inequitable, and iniquitous. At the risk of repetition, I reaffirm that it is unfair in its provisions and seemingly recklessly inconsiderate of the interests of that foundation of our national fabric—the American farmer.

Mr. Chairman, if one can view with equanimity the situation of this forlorn flock master, I believe he could have witnessed without emotion the pressing of the crown of thorns upon the head of the Nazarene, the stretching of His body on the cross, the driving of each nail through His limbs, the dipping of the soldier's sponge into a tankard of vinegar mingled with gall, and the putting of it to His parched and quivering lips, and, following His last cry of agony, see deliberately scrawled above His head the words, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]. [Applause.]

[Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, you do me great honor to permit me to close the debate on this important measure, but as the hour is fast approaching the midnight meridian and as this beautiful Hall is gradually becoming depleted, it would be cruel to tax the patience of those who are here with a long drawn-out speech, going into details. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will, therefore, content myself by noticing the salient points of objections made by the opponents of this bill. Were I not a new Member, standing in need of experience in debate, and were it not a fact that no one can become useful in this life without taking an active part in the business in which he is engaged, I would not pretend to discuss this question at this late hour.

Mr. Chairman, everybody knows to-day that a tariff is a tax and everybody knows that wherever a tariff is placed upon an article of consumption it gives a chance to increase the price of that article to the consumer in proportion to the amount of the tariff, especially in those cases where there is no competition. For this reason I have never been a believer in high taxation of any kind, but owing to the inequality in the distribution of wealth among men I have always advocated the idea that the larger burdens of taxation ought to be placed upon those who are most able to bear them and the lighter burden should be placed upon those who are least able to bear them, taxing the luxuries most heavily and placing a correspondingly low rate upon the necessaries of life.

There are two great struggling forces among men to-day. One is the capital, controlled by the few, and the other is that great active industrial army of labor, the basis of all productive wealth. I would have no one believe that I entertain ulterior designs against honest capital. He who thinks that a great civilization can be built up without capital makes a mistake, the same as he who thinks a great civilization can be built up without labor. They are counterparts of a great busy commercial world, and must work in harmony in order to produce the greatest results; but the one should be just as honest as the other, and in the adjustment of tariff taxation the one should not be preferred at the expense of the other.

Yet it is a significant fact that for the last 50 years those who have been in control of capital have become immensely rich and those who have been controlling labor have remained poor. There may be more than one cause for this, but everybody knows that the chief cause is the advantage afforded by a high protected tariff, which tends to destroy foreign competition, and with foreign competition out of the way the home industries have pooled their interests and destroyed home competition, thereby giving them an opportunity to prey upon the daily earnings of the masses at their pleasure.

After the fall of the Roman Empire history tells us that the barbarians overran the civilized world and that that portion of land lying along the Mediterranean Sea and the Straits of Gibraltar to the Atlantic Ocean fell into the hands of the Moors. At the ocean end of these straits there is a rocky promontory, called the Pillar of Hercules. At a point on this promontory, called Tarifa, we are told that these Moorish robbers took their stand and collected a toll from every vessel which passed through the Straits of Gibraltar. This toll was called a tariff, which found its way into the civilized world; but the application of this term by our forefathers was never intended to aid anyone in the commission of crime, but, instead thereof, it was intended by them to assist the Government in raising revenue to defray the expenses of the General Government.

Mr. Chairman, when we examine the present wool schedule as it stands to-day under the Payne law, and as it has stood under other acts ever since the year 1864, except the Wilson law, and when we listen to the arguments of certain gentlemen on the floor of this House, offering one excuse after another for the purpose of preventing a change in these high rates of duty, we are forced to conclude that there are now and have been for a long time in America strong advocates of the doctrine of the Moorish barbarians, whose methods were indefensible—robbery by brutal force. Who will say that the present rates on the finished product of wool, averaging nearly 100 per cent, is not robbery? The President of the United States has said more than once that it is indefensible. Who will deny that proposition?

The Sherman antitrust law was intended to protect the consumer from the ravages of high taxation, but the tariff barons have recklessly disregarded its provisions, and until recently the Federal courts have been very slow to enforce it, thereby encouraging unlawful combinations of capital in restraint of trade, until to-day we find a few criminal combines controlling capital stock aggregating nearly $40,000,000,000. How can we best relieve ourselves from these threatening conditions is the great question before the American people to-day. By the enforcement of the antitrust law we can break up unlawful combinations of capital and thereby stimulate competition. We can reduce the tariff taxation, which will aid competition and save to the people vast future fortunes which would otherwise be piled up in the hands of the already rich few. What Congressman will shun his duty to the people in this great contest? Who will stand upon the floor of this Chamber and declare himself a disciple of the Moorish pirates?

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us proposes to reduce the tariff on wool from a duty of 44.31 per cent to 20 per cent. It further proposes to reduce the tariff on the finished product of wool from an average of 90.10 per cent to 42.55 per cent. I am aware that it is not good policy to make radical changes, ordinarily speaking, but the present rate of duty on wool and woolen goods is so unreasonably high that it takes a radical change to bring it down to a decent and common-sense basis. I think all honest statesmen now agree that the primary object of a tariff is to raise revenue to defray the expenses of government. In his report as Secretary of the Treasury in 1845, Robert J. Walker said:

No more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue. That the maximum revenue should be imposed on luxuries. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

That strikes me, Mr. Chairman, as being sound doctrine. I think the committee in framing this bill must have been guided by the light of these wholesome principles, for they have more than cut the present rates in two, and at the same time it has been estimated that the bill will raise nearly as much revenue as the present law. In 1910 the present law yielded a revenue from imports on raw wool in the sum of $21,128,728.74 and from imports on the finished products of wool the sum of $20,775,820.76, making a total of $41,908,549.50. Under the proposed law it is estimated that we will get a revenue from the imports on raw wool in the sum of $13,398,200 and from the imports on the finished product the sum of $27,158,000, making a total of $40,556,200.

The greatest fight made against the passage of this measure is waged against that part of the bill dealing with raw wool, yet it is true that a few gentlemen on the other side of the House, belonging to the reactionary school of the Republican Party, such men as PAYNE, of New York, and DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, have made a stubborn fight against the whole of the bill. They remind me of a story I once heard of a church, met in council for the purpose of settling the question relative to the building of a new church house. One of the gentlemen offered a resolution in favor of erecting a new building. The motion carried. Then another gentlemen, wanting to be economical, made a motion that in the construction of the new building the workmen should use the material in the old building in so far as it was fit for such use. This motion carried also, whereupon another gentleman, desiring to keep up the accustomed meetings for worship, made a motion that the church use the old building as a place of worship while the new building was under construction. The motion carried. [Laughter.]

The haunts of high protection, to enrich the few, are very sacred to these gentlemen. They love to worship within the old walls, decorated with the pictures of their masters, whom they have served so long and so well, and they refuse to surrender them without a desperate struggle. And now, Mr. Chairman, they come here and advance a most ingenious argument—the argument of procrastination—in order to prevent the passage of this bill. They claim that we should take no action in the revision of this schedule until the Tariff Commission has made its report, which, they admit, will not be until next winter. This claim is made in the face of the fact that this commission has been at work for 15 months, and, on request, furnished the Ways and Means Committee all the facts in their possession, to be used in the construction of this bill. This is the burden of the speech of the distinguished gentleman [Mr. MANN], my colleague from Illinois, who opened the argument on his side of this Chamber for the discussion of this bill. He has been followed by every standpatter who has taken a part in this debate.

Mr. Chairman, this is the argument advanced by the criminal when indicted for a felony. If it were left to him, he never would be tried. The first thing he does is to enter court with an application for a continuance in order that he may be permitted to hunt up new evidence. It is a trick to deceive the people and should be tolerated by no one who is in favor of honest tariff reduction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There are other gentlemen on both sides of this House, I understand, who would be glad to see wool placed on the free list. It is claimed by some that the doctrine of free raw material is Democratic and for that reason we ought to admit raw wool free of duty into the United States. I do not so understand that the Democratic Party is committed to that doctrine. While it is true that Mr. Cleveland once advocated freer raw materials and his friends succeeded in having this sentiment incorporated in the Democratic platform in 1892, yet never before nor since has this idea found its way into a Democratic platform. Raw material is owned in the first instance by individuals and produced by individual labor—men who are at most only ordinary livers. It passes from their hands into the hands of the corporations for a finishing touch. Inasmuch as we have seen that a tariff tends to enhance the value of the article upon which it is placed, and inasmuch as the primary object of a tariff is for revenue, I can see no good reason why, in adjusting tariff rates, Congress should discriminate between raw material, which will yield a revenue, and the finished product, which will yield a revenue. I am aware that in this country we have men who preach a strange doctrine, a doctrine for the benefit of the classes as against the masses, but this doctrine can not be justified by the golden rule, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

The poor man is just as much entitled to the benefit of a tariff which will enhance the price of his product as is the rich man. While a tariff can not be justified for protection alone, yet we all know that in the adjustment of a tariff for revenue it gives an incidental protection, and the poor man is just as much entitled to its benefits as the rich man.

The production of wool is one of the oldest industries known to man. It is coeval with civilization. Abraham was a herder of sheep. It was the shepherd on the mountain who first discovered the Star of Bethlehem, which pointed to the manger-cradle of our Savior. It was the shepherds who met in a distant land to determine how they might best preserve the life of that Savior child. Wool has always played a conspicuous part in furnishing raiment to mankind. He who can live in a cold climate without wool is an animal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that hand in hand with the shepherd of old comes the farmer of to-day, and with the farm goes the flock. It is an incident to the farm throughout the Union and throughout the world. I do not subscribe to the doctrine urged here by some of my friends that sheep raising in America is gradually dying out. You had just as well say that farming is gradually dying out. There is no more reason for the one than for the other. Sheep will always be raised on the farm, because of its usefulness to the farmer, not only in furnishing him with food and raiment, but in destroying the annual shrubbery in old fields and for the further reason that its habits of repose is upon the highest and poorest points of the farm, furnishing a rich fertilizer, to be carried down the hillside by future rains as an alluvial deposit.

Mr. Chairman, it is urged with great force here that the present rate of 44.31 per cent duty on wool is not too high, and that if a reduction be made, it will destroy the sheep industry in this country. Now, I wish to repeat that the sheep is incidental to farming. You show me a territory where sheep raising is an industry to itself, and I will point you to a territory which is fit for nothing else except grazing. Yes; in the mountains of Wyoming, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona, where nothing else can be raised, we find great flocks of sheep, raised for the sole purpose of making money. With the advantage of the cheap, wild western lands and sheltered by the high protection on wool, many men have grown rich, and to-day we have wool kings the same as we have ironmasters. One gentleman began business in 1894 with a capital of $960. Prior to that he had been herding sheep for others, but now he embarks in the sheep-raising business for the purpose of making money. He paid $2 a head in 1894, which is shown by his answer in volume 5 of the Tariff Hearings, page 5113, which is as follows:

Mr. HILL (of the Ways and Means Committee). What did you give for your sheep apiece when you started into it and had your 2,500?
Mr. DELFELDER. $2 per head.
Mr. HILL. $2 apiece?
Mr. DELFELDER. Yes, sir.

Within 14 years he made out of this business $100,000, which is shown from his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, in volume 5, page 5110:

Mr. CLARK. How much money did you have then and how much were you worth in property when you went into the sheep business in 1894?
Mr. DELFELDER. $960.
Mr. CLARK. How much are you worth now?
Mr. DELFELDER. That would depend entirely upon conditions.
Mr. CLARK. You are worth over $100,000, are you not?
Mr. DELFELDER. Yes, sir; I think that would be a safe estimate.

What is true of Mr. Delfelder is true of many other gentlemen who have made sheep raising a business in the western mountains.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that if I had been drawing this bill I would have placed the rate on raw wool a little higher than 20 per cent. I prepared an amendment in our caucus to make it 25 per cent, but the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] took it away from me before I could get recognition. But after this bill had been reported out from the Ways and Means Committee I trembled at the thought of placing my judgment above that of gentlemen who have served here for many years, fighting to give the toiling millions relief from burdensome taxation which has been placed upon them, not by the votes of all the Republicans, but by the votes of standpatters. I do not desire to denounce any of my Republican friends in bitter terms, for I do not believe in radical partisan speeches; I love all mankind and would not say a word to wound the feelings of my Republican friends any sooner than that of my Democratic friends. I love them both alike, but when it comes to have a certain school of men say to me that I shall pay a tribute to those who are already rich, a tribute so high that I can not pay it without depriving myself of the necessaries of life and subjecting my family to a beggarly living, then I come to the parting of ways with these gentlemen. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I take it that when the gentleman believes in the high tariff on raw wool he believes in protection. Is that true?

Mr. FOWLER. I tried to make my position clear. Whenever a tariff is placed upon any article of consumption, it amounts to a protection in a sense, not, however, in the same sense that my standpat friends on the other side think of protection, but it amounts to an incidental protection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If my friend will yield further I will say to him that a Democrat who is advocating a protective tariff reminds me of a bow-legged man, without any athletic experience, trying to walk a tight rope. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I know very well that I am weak enough to be bow-legged, but I am strong enough to stand by the right of the helpless in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I say, Mr. Chairman, that if a tariff placed upon an article of consumption amounts to incidental protection, I am just as much in favor of giving the producer the benefit of it as I am the man who makes the finished product.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FOWLER. In justice to the House at this late hour, I feel that I ought to decline. Mr. Chairman, the strongest argument offered in opposition to the 20 per cent on raw wool, as proposed by this bill, is that it is too low to foster the sheep industry in America. This is the Ohio idea. I desire to examine the argument of my Ohio friend. I listened to a speech of one of them [Mr. WILLIS] a few days ago with much interest. He is one of the best looking as well as one of the most intelligent gentlemen on that side of the House. I understand that he is a new Member, but I fear he will not grow much older in this House if he continues to advocate the doctrine which he preached in that speech, although I should like to see him come back for many years. [Applause and laughter.] This distinguished gentleman said that a 20 per cent tariff would not be sufficient to protect the woolgrowers of this country, and declared with much emphasis that the passage of this bill would destroy the sheep industry in Ohio. He cited figures to show how Ohio sheep raising had suffered under free wool during the life of the Wilson law. Then followed the speech of another distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who, in more bitter terms, denounced the 20 per cent rate on raw wool. He, too, cited tables showing a much more alarming condition in Ohio during the life of the Wilson law than those cited by Mr. WILLIS.

He declared upon high authority that Ohio had 4,000,000 head of sheep when the Wilson bill became a law, and that three years thereafter, on its repeal, Ohio had but little over a million sheep. He also declared that the sheep in Ohio were worth but 50 cents a head. Where on earth these gentlemen got these figures is a mystery to all of us. We all know that Ohio sheep are among the largest, as well as the highest-priced, sheep in this country. We have already seen that Mr. Delfelder paid $2 a head in 1894 for New Mexico sheep, which are much smaller and much more inferior than the Ohio sheep.

I hold in my hand Bulletin No. 64 of the Bureau of Statistics of the United States Department of Agriculture, which gives the number and value in gold of the sheep in Ohio from 1867 to 1910, inclusive. I am informed by the Department of Commerce and Labor that it is the most authentic table extant. I invite the attention of my Ohio friends to this table. It shows that in 1867 Ohio had 7,159,177 sheep; that in 1894, the year in which the Wilson tariff bill was passed, Ohio had 3,765,704 sheep. I wish you gentlemen would tell me what became of that three and one-half million of sheep during those 27 years of high protection. During the entire life of the Wilson bill you lost less than one and one-half million sheep. In 1869 you had 6,300,000 head, valued in gold at $7,898,230—a little over a dollar and a quarter a head. Under the worst year of the Wilson law, in 1896, you had 2,754,613 sheep, valued in gold at $5,247,538, or nearly $2 per head.

These figures show the most alarming condition to sheep raising in Ohio, and if argument could be adduced to support the contention of my Ohio friends, these figures are the most convincing; and why they did not cite them in their argument I am at a loss to know, unless they wanted their constituents to believe that the Democratic Party and its policies have always stood against the interest of sheep raising. And again my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] would have his constituents believe that sheep in Ohio during the life of the Wilson bill were worth only 50 cents a head, whereas as a matter of fact the bulletin from which I have read shows that they were worth nearly $2 per head during that period. I offer this bulletin for the benefit of my friends, and ask that it be printed in full:
